The maid sets out the luncheon of cold ham, cold something else and cold something more. Father doesn't come home for luncheon—he eats down town. The children eat alone. Home from school in the evening they find mother still absent. She's probably at Mrs. Duff-Smythe's Bridge Whist, and children are farthest from her mind. Free to come and go as they please, the children turn out into the highways and byways and find their pleasures. Mother may turn up around six o'clock. Father comes in about six-thirty, and he's brought home a grouch. Small comfort for children in a grouchy parent. Mother nibbles at a fancy biscuit, sips a cup of tea and is away to her boudoir to prepare for the Huntingdon-Rice's ball. She drags Father along. He makes a big fuss about Society taking all one's time from Los Angeles. The ocean was decidedly rough and the boat rolled from side to side. A submarine captain on board told me the boat was top-heavy, and it was loaded light. I was passing the entrance to the bridge when people began pouring from their cabins, buckling on life preservers, faces blanched and terror-stricken. There was a concerted rush to starboard. The boat gave an upward heave, and a woman fainted and fell at my feet. I picked up a life-preserver and, buckling it about her waist, carried her to a railing. A captain in uniform ran shouting into the crowd, but his voice was drowned in the confusion. As I leaped to the rail to dive overboard I glanced over my shoulder. The crowd had paused. Women were chatting comfortably, while the men were calmly enjoying a smoke. A man in puttees, carrying a megaphone, approached me and grinned: 'We are making a moving picture, but we didn't shoot this scene. This was the rehearsal. You got so much pep in it we'll give you a fifty dollar voucher if you'll do it over and make the dive.'

Booth Tarkington is said to be an admirer of the gentler qualities of the colored people. The following story at least bears up the assumption. "They are a delightful race," Mr. Tarkington is quoted as saying. "I know a minister who once married a young colored couple. 'How much Ah owes you, revund,' the bridegroom asked after the ceremony. 'Oh,' said the minister, 'pay me whatever it is worth to you.' The young darky looked his dusky bride over from head to foot with adoring eyes. Turning to the minister, he said, 'You's ruined me fo' life, revund, yo' shoa' has!'"

The Whistler Journal quotes Thomas Carlyle's experience when he sat for his portrait to Watts: "There was Mr. Watts, a mon of note. And I went to his studio, and there was much meestification, and screens were drawn around the easel, and curtains were drawn, and I was not allowed to see anything. And then at last the screens were drawn aside, and there I was. And I looked. Mr. Watts, a great mon, he said to me, 'How do you like it?' And I turned to Mr. Watts, and I said: 'Mon, I would have ye know. I am in the habit of wurin' clean lunen.'"

She looks ten years younger." "Well, I am so glad, Cousin George," Helen babbled. "And if she keeps on using that rouge I'm leaving her she'll always have that healthy complexion, like mine."

A real estate agent was showing a prospective buyer over a large estate in the south of England. He was a youngster who had been through the war and had become Americanized. As the car threaded its way through English lanes he extolled the natural beauties of the place, park, meadows, woods. At last, the car having arrived at a clear space where there were neither trees nor gardens, the enthusiastic agent pointed heavenwards. Waving his arm, he concluded, "And there's a sun for you! Can you beat it?"

A Simple Test Will Convince You

Next cleaning day, after your rugs have been vigorously swept, telephone one of our Authorized Dealers to send out a representative with a Hoover—no obligation, of course. Just let him glide The Hoover over your cleanest rugs, after first showing you that its bag contains no dirt.

You will be appalled at the dirt he will soon empty from the Hoover bag. You will be surprised that such apparently clean rugs could in reality be so unsanitary.

Naturally, such a condition is no reflection upon you. It is simply impossible to dislodge buried dirt from rugs except by beating, electric sweeping and air suction. The Hoover is, therefore, an absolute necessity.

Electrically it beats out all the nap-wearing, disease-laden grit from rug depths; electrically it sweeps up the stubbornest litter, erects crushed nap, freshens colors and cleans by air—in one easy, rapid, dustless operation guaranteed to add years to the life and beauty of all your rugs and thereby to repeatedly save its cost.

Have a free home demonstration of this time-perfected cleaner and its attachments.

Backed by the Guarantee Bond of the oldest and largest makers of electric cleaners, The Hoover is obtainable in three sizes, all moderately priced, on easy payments.

If a decision is reached early in the year it is likely that the first purchase arranged co-operatively will be that of garden seeds. Many of the members will belong to the Farmer's Institute and will buy their fertilizers for their gardens through that body. But members will be glad to begin with garden seeds as they will realize that the best seeds are procurable from the best dealers only in large quantities. They can then give in their lists of seeds required and orders can be bulked and all share in the wholesale rates. After this beginning, other purchases will be suggested although it is well at the outset to go slowly. The well known Clubs of the English Institutes such as Clothing Clubs, Pig Clubs, Rabbit Clubs and so forth are all based on the co-operative purchase and sale idea.

Besides materials many Institutes buy labor-saving devices co-operatively, tools, implements of many sorts either for co-operative use by members or for members to make a selection from. Vacuum cleaners and mangles and canning outfits are owned by many Institutes in this way. Fruit bottles are often ordered in the Spring in wholesale lots and in the winter months knitting wool and other material for carrying on home industries are frequent requests.

One essential is a good treasurer as accurate accounts are of course a prime necessity. The regular monthly meeting makes a convenient centre for taking orders and distributing purchases. We were all proud during the war that the Government made the Institutes distributing centres for rationed food such as sugar and in many cases this was the beginning of an interest in co-operation and its methods.

The Belgian Women's Institutes are fortunate in having open to them always the whole machinery of the largest co-operative societies, the Boerinnbund of the Flemish Farmers' co-operative organization.

FROM THE ALBERTA WOMEN'S INSTITUTE PRESIDENT.

Everyone knows and loves Isabel Noble and when she writes a letter it is very welcome. The one just received is doubly welcome because it means that we are being of some service to that efficient body of women the Alberta Women's Institutes. This federation had for years the splendid services of Mary MacIsaacs in the Department and Isabel Noble out in the field. Miss Noble writes:—

"Dear Mrs Watt:

I want to tell you how much I am enjoying your page on Institute work in the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL. The February number especially has so many helpful suggestions. The articles on Discussions I heartily approve of. We find it hard work to bring out discussions but your suggestions I believe will be of help to all. I'm sure they will help me."

What one likes is the last phrase "I'm sure they will help me." We are always so ready to think that sermons are good for others!

When Miss Noble, herself born in the United States, visited Manitoba she left with our Institutes there the beautiful collect of the American Club Women which I should like to give here in response to many inquiries as to where it can be got.

"Keep us O God, from pettiness; let us be large in thought, in order, in deed.

Let us be done with fault-finding and leave off self seeking

May we put away pretence and meet each other face to face without self-pity and without prejudice.

May we never be hasty in judgment, and always generous.

Let us take time for all things; make us to grow calm, serene, gentle.

Teach us to put into action our better impulses, straight-forward and unafraid.

Grant we may realize that it is the little things that create differences; that in the big things of life we are one.

And may we strive to touch and to know the great common woman's heart of us all; and, O, Lord God, let us not forget to be kind."

Perhaps this will answer the perennially old question which has come up again, Should the Institute meeting open with prayer? If so what?

We all know that it is entirely the Institute's own affair whether it does or no, but it is such a thorny question and if we were all not agreed that it is the last matter we should quarrel about, there might be real trouble over the question. As you all know some Institutes do have a few minutes' silent prayer, others do open with the National Anthem and in the States the above Collect is largely used. But by far the larger number have no form of prayer and often no formal opening. On the programme of the first Institute formed in England there are two prayers at the beginning and the end. That before January meeting reads:—

"O, Lord make each member of this Institute Thy instrument for good and inspire each one with words and deeds for the community" and after December:—

"O, Lord give us grace to carry out the resolutions of our happier moments."

A plan is being considered at the Essex Women's Institutes of having at the opening, the beautiful dedication of Cecil Spring Rice "I vow to thee my Country," then for the reception of new members to sing the Institute Ode as originated by the Canadian Women's Institutes and for closing, the National Anthem. I think this is very fine and ought to make the meetings dignified and uplifting.

LEADERS IN COMMUNITY SINGING.

One is often asked whether governments send out leaders in community singing and if so what is the arrangement locally. One example is that of Cornell University (the State University of New York) with its Agricultural and Domestic Science Colleges, which has entered into community life in the most wonderful way. In Canada we have made a beginning with having Mrs. Rose Morgan at our big Conventions. Those who heard her at Alberta last year will never forget her description of "Songs that Live" and her happy leading of the "Sing-Song" before each meeting.

The leaders sent out from Cornell usually choose the time of a Conference or a Short Course in Home Economics or a Demonstration School of one sort or another and the instruction and assistance is given as part of the Conference or Extension work. These leaders make use of local material and the local choirs are pressed into service. Old Fashioned Singing Schools are started and before the week passes usually a keen interest is worked up in Community Singing.

At a big Conference the programme of one session read:—

Sewing Demonstrations
Dress-Making Shop
Junior Games
Preparation of a Picnic Lunch and of a School Lunch—Demonstrations.
Community Picnic
Community Singing

It all sounds most attractive. Community Singing has come to stay and even if it may be overdone as in one case in British Columbia where we have all to sing after each course of a luncheon, still it is a splendid thing and there is so very much in the leading that it would be worth while working the matter up among the Institutes. All our Conventions, nowadays, are the richer for our Chorus singing. Let us make the most of it.

THE QUESTION BOX

Question—Are Institute Members admitted free at all entertainments got up by the Institute?

Answer—Each Institute decides this matter for itself and on the merits of the case. But there is a general feeling that members should have at least reduced rates. When this is done it is usual to direct either that the badge be worn in a conspicuous

THE CHOIRMASTER

Some Reflections on a Much Tried Functionary Who is not Infrequently a Woman

BY HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

LATELY I was glancing over a series of essays on musical bibliography by O. G. Sonneck, an official of the Library of Congress at Washington, who has made a specialty of collecting historical information with regard to music in America; and encountered something which set me thinking. He spoke of the great gap in the data relating to this particular field through the lack of information with regard to the development of sacred music and the church choir in North America. When one comes to think of it, this is a very serious omission, for not only in the greater part of the United States but in Canada, the church choir is the unit from which a very considerable part of our musical effort springs. When we look into the history of the choral organizations which have made Canada famous, we find that they originally grew from the personal ambitions of choirmasters; who at the outset used their own church singers as the nucleus of the larger organizations they have created. A year or so ago when the history of the Mendelssohn Choir was published in these columns, details were given of the long apprenticeship which its founder, Dr. A. S. Vogt, served in various churches of Western Ontario, and finally at Jarvis Street Baptist Church, Toronto. I think it will be found that in almost every instance where a choral society has risen to an important position in any part of Canada it will be found that its conductor was or is a church choirmaster. That was assuredly true of the old Philharmonic Society of Toronto which exercised so wide an influence over the earlier history of Canadian music; and which was developed by the late Dr. Torrington from his vantage point as choirmaster of the Metropolitan Methodist Church of that city. It is true of the many notable and brilliant choral organizations which have sprung up in Winnipeg, Hamilton, London, Brantford and other Canadian cities. Moreover if we look into the professional history of Canadian singers who have gained international success in the operatic and the concert field we almost invariably find that their early training has been obtained in church choirs. The history of Albani who as a young girl was a choir singer in Montreal and later in Albany has been repeated in the cases of Florence Easton, Jeanne Gordon, Bertha Crawford and numerous other noted singers of Canadian training and origin.

Accepting the church choir as an immensely important unit in the progress and development of music we must go back to the unit within the unit, the choirmaster; upon whose enthusiasm, taste, and personality everything depends. From the earliest times he has played a part in music that many are apt to overlook. Most of us are prone to regard musical history as chiefly signifying the biographies of various men of genius who have arisen at epochal periods; just as in ordinary history the individual achievements of a few statesmen and generals are stressed out of proportion to the general course of events to which a great many active personalities contributed. Thus little attention is paid to the great part that choirmasters or capell-masters have played in the general advancement of the art ever since music became an active factor in the spread of Christian worship.

Personally I get a good deal of pleasure from digging out the facts surrounding unfamiliar names whenever I run across them on concert programmes and I not infrequently find them to be those of organists and choirmasters long since dead, whose work is forgotten and yet who exercised an immense influence in their time. The ancient order of choirmasters may boast at least two names of immortal fame in their roster, Palestrina and Bach, but there were countless others who did yeoman service. Not long since I heard the New York Symphony Orchestra play a composition by a modern composer founded on an air by Thomas Tallis. The name is not wholly obscure because it still figures occasionally in the musical services of the Anglican Church, especially at Christmas and Eastertide. But few really know whether Tallis was a Victorian or Elizabethan musician. Yet Tallis, who is known to historians as the father of English Cathedral music, lived, and followed his art as a church musician, throughout the most momentous period in English religious history, that of the Tudor Reformation. He was born in 1515 six years after Henry VIII came to the Throne; and died in 1585, when Elizabeth had been Queen for twenty seven years. For most of this period he was officially connected with the institution around which sanguinary warfare waged,—the church. As a lad he was a chorister at old St. Pauls and as a young man, organist at Waltham Abbey. On the dissolution of that monastery in 1540 it is recorded that he received twenty shillings wages due and twenty shillings as a compensation for loss of position. Shortly afterward, he was appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, directing and composing music for the choristers of that historic institution,—which is still maintained. From thence onward he continued to produce liturgical music of an inspired and elevated devotional character. He passed unscathed through the conflicts of the Nationalist and Romanist parties in the Church; and composed at will for either English or Latin text. When in 1552 the second prayer book of Edward VI was issued in the common tongue, he supplied the music for the new form of service; but some of his most beautiful works were Latin chants, probably composed during the reign of Mary, some of which were later adapted to English words. He seems to have enjoyed the favor of Queen Elizabeth for, in 1565, she granted to him and to his pupil, William Byrd, a monopoly of the right to print music and to sell ruled music paper for copying and composition. There is however strong reason for believing that both he and Byrd, though outwardly conforming and the leading creators of choral music for the reformed church, remained Catholics at heart.

At another recent concert I found the name of J. Matheson (1681-1764) on a programme. It was attached to a beautiful air, played by the gifted violinist Josef Stopak. I had never seen the name on a concert programme before and, curiosity aroused, I traced its significance; making the interesting discovery that it was that of a man who among many other callings was a choirmaster, responsible for much. He was in truth the very first man in the history of church music to introduce women's voices into religious services. Thus in the case of every choir row in which the women singers are involved or which arises from differences between the soprano soloist and the choirmaster we may blame Matheson. Though his name indicates Scottish descent he was born in Hamburg and christened Johann. He was a veritable "Admirable Crichton," for he was a student of laws and of languages, and is reputed to have acted as Ambassador for the free city of Hamburg to other States. He wrote important treaties including biographies of the musicians prior to his time, and an account of all the known musical instruments up to his period. He was an executant on the harp, organ and harpsichord and both a tenor singer and conductor at the Hamburg Opera House. In this capacity he befriended the youthful Handel prior to the latter's advent to England. But it was as choral director of Hamburg Cathedral that the progressive measures which influenced the subsequent course of choir performance were initiated by him. The innovation of employing women choristers, which spread to other lands has been mentioned; and it was he also who developed and gave vital existence to the church cantata, afterwards brought to a higher perfection by Bach. All his compositions were supposed until recently to have been lost; and it was by the discovery of his air for violin that his name has been lifted from oblivion, so far as the public, other than musical antiquaries, is concerned. We can imagine, in view of the above facts, how great a figure he cut in musical circles two hundred years ago.

Fall in, Folks! We're Going Home

but he goes along to keep up appearances, so he says. Yet it was father who helped to place Mother's feet on the ladder to social success.

What becomes of Frank and Marjorie? Marjorie has fallen in love with a man of poor reputation as a man, but feelingly referred to as a "heavenly dancer" by the girls in Marjorie's set. She spends her spare time with rough people in rough places. She can tell a risqué story without a trace of a blush. Though she's eighteen she knows nothing of herself physically. Mother has been too busy Society strutting to tell her daughter of the mysteries of life.

And what of Frank? Oh, Frank's spare moments, (he has plenty of them) are spent in Murphy's pool hall and the questionable dance hall on the back street. He's learned how to break the prohibition laws. He stands in well with the youth he mixes with, because he knows the place to get all the liquor needed for a little "petting" party.

The crash comes. Marjorie, never taught self-control, never told to be wary of certain men, listens to the words of so-called love and falls. Frank takes the easy path. He finds the roses outgrown by the thorns, and eventually becomes a "bum." Both outcasts of Society, true, yet both made outcasts by Society.

The parents? They wring their hands and cry aloud unto the skies. "What have we done to deserve this?" they moan. They attempt to console one another. "We've always been good to Marjorie and Frank. They have had everything they wanted. We educated them and told them to be good citizens. We even cried over them when they were babies."

Had everything they wanted? No. They wanted parent's companionship and guidance. Toys a plenty and good times, modern good times? Yes. A sincere parental interest in their welfare? No.

A word on Jazz. I've no daughters of the dancing age. By the time they reach that age I'm sure Jazz will have gone the road to the garbage dump. It's on the garbage wagon now and the driver's about ready to say "Get up."

This physical ruination of young men and women to make a Jazzy holiday must stop or back we go to animalism in the sense in which we speak of animals. I think we're prone to libel animals. Jazz does not generate Love; it mocks Love.

ABOUT Fathers. Too many fathers have a mistaken idea. They admit they should be companions to their sons but shun, yes, resent any inference that they become comrades of their daughters. Sometimes a father can talk to a daughter better than the mother. It's a good plan for a father to take a tramp with a daughter. I'm waiting for my two to reach an age of understanding. I'm going to make their lives so interesting they're going to miss me and long for me when I'm out of sight. How will I do it? I'll find a way. There's plenty of woods where we live. There are hundreds of running streams. How better can you talk of Nature than by getting back to Nature?

Prohibition has prohibited the man who doesn't want liquor from getting it. I mean by that, the man who drank in a public bar did so occasionally, because he could get it. That kind of drinker does not go bootlegging today. The young man who didn't drink before prohibition does drink now. Worse, the young woman who once loathed liquor, or the smell of it upon a man's breath, drinks it now. In our town the youth who knows where to get liquor is very popular with both sexes. There are many "hip-pocket" drinkers here. A boy takes a girl to a dance. Between dances they slyly slip out into the corridor or ante-room and "swig" from a small flask the youth carries on his hip. What is the result? What is generally the result when you pour gasoline on a fire?

I believe we'll have to get back home before there'll be a change in morals; in the temperament and daily life of Canadians. Unthinking parents must discard the cloak of foolish sentiment and don their thinking caps. The home, basis, rock of the foundation of any country, must truly become HOME,—not the parking place for a mother's gloves or a father's lodge apron. Too long has home been a half-way house along the road of life. It must be put on rollers and moved to the very beginning of Life. Sons and daughters must be called back, nay welcomed back. If through the means of proper home influence, we bring about the regeneration of our young people, won't the effort be worth while? If we can get the Society-crazed mother back to normalcy; back to where she will serve fewer pink teas and more black tea and full course meals—if we can see the maid relegated to the position of maid, not mistress in a home—if we can, as fathers, forget an occasional game of cards at the club, an occasional Sunday novel and one or two of those important business deals and spend the time thus saved with our growing up sons and daughters, how long will it be before the craze for insane pleasure dies out, to be replaced by the desire for sanity in living, action and thought?

Companionship is the key to the heart of the teen-age boy and girl. We parents all have a key. Shall we insert it and throw open the doors, or shall we keep them forever closed? Let's make home worthy to be called such. Let's see if we can't coax our sons and daughters to come back home. Let us as parents go back first and welcome them with open arms. Let's go.

Editor's Note.—This article is written by one who is evidently strongly convinced of the necessity for reform in the modern parent. While we may not sympathize with his prohibition views, we have found this article highly interesting and stimulating.

Nothing So Beautiful

As a wealth of well-groomed hair

Nothing so beautiful and nothing more easily attained—if you know how. Satiny, silky, glossy hair is the reward of intelligent care. Follow the suggestions we give you here and prove it.

Begin by learning how to shampoo, for this is all-important. The first step is a bottle of Palmolive Shampoo, the blend of palm and olive oils. Use as directed and watch results.

First is the wonderful softness you have never before experienced after washing. There is none of the usual harsh dryness and flyaway brittleness.

Your hair is wonderfully silky in texture, with a beautiful satiny gloss. Most important, your scalp is healthfully cleansed from every trace of scurf and dandruff. Ordinary shampooing doesn't get these results. They come from the action of palm and olive oils, the softening, soothing cleansers discovered 3,000 years ago in ancient Egypt.

Olive oil for gloss—palm oil for richness

Olive oil possesses softening qualities which neutralize the drying effects of washing. Palm oil contributes body, richness and lasting qualities.

In combination they produce a thick, mild, profuse, penetrating lather which softens the scalp and reaches every root and hair cell.

This lather loosens the dandruff scales, dislodges and dissolves them, leaving the scalp and hair free to function healthfully.

The greatest benefit

This thorough removal of dandruff, which doctors call seborrhea, is most necessary, as even the accumulation on healthy scalps injures the hair.

The dry, oily scales clog the roots of the hair, preventing proper nutrition. Soon the hair begins to fall out. The blend of palm and olive oils you get in Palmolive softens and penetrates the scales, loosening the cap-like accumulation:

Gentle massage forces it into the tissue of the scalp, leaving it healthfully purged and clean. Hair shampooed with Palmolive is never dry, harsh and brittle. The blending of these soothing oils leaves it soft, glossy and silky.

Summery Frocks of Modish Fabrics

BY CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

As pretty as the new cotton dress goods are in the piece, they are a hundredfold more beautiful when made up into summery frocks.

Cotton in its many phases is an unassuming kind of textile. You rarely see it posing as silk and when it does, it is such a bad actor that the fraud is detected at once and it receives very little patronage. When it masquerades as wool it is equally unsuccessful. We admire cotton most when it makes no false pretenses, just as we do people. Thus we like our cottons straight and we also like them made up simply.

New arrivals from Paris herald the vogue of crepe, embroidered voiles and batistes and even ratine, and our own designers whether in custom shop or factory, have not been slow to appreciate the beauty and the possibilities of cotton textiles available for this summer. Some of the models that we have seen have been so charming as to make us almost wish we could skip the Spring interlude and that Set in the front of the skirt were little sections of lace-trimmed batiste. The dress hung straight from the neck, confined at the waist with a loose girdle of black crepe ribbon.

MOST of these summer frocks hang straight from the neck in chemise style and are girdled with a ribbon usually from an inch to three inches wide tied in the back, with long ends.

Red is one of the colors which shines forth resplendent in the summer wardrobe. According to our conservative way of thinking this is inconsistent. Red is too warm a color for a Canadian summer; still fashion must have her own way and we have no doubt that some of the warmest days will see youth and beauty arrayed in all these various shades of red. There is no doubt about their being attractive and one is sometimes at a loss to know which she prefers, the yellowish reds or the purer salvia tones. Of all the new

Two charming summer costumes, showing the latest touches in decoration

Summer with her accessories of clover bloom and summer frocks and hats might arrive without further delay.

White is becoming very fashionable once again; but except for confirmation and wedding dresses almost invariably there is a touch of color somewhere. Colored embroideries on a white ground are admitted to be quite the thing and it is not the pale tints alone, but for example, red and black used in a small design so as to suggest, but not quite form a block. An extremely pretty model that we saw was made up of just such material and design with a simple round untrimmed neck, short sleeves with little turned-back plain batiste lace-trimmed cuff. The skirt had panels down the side made of plain white batiste trimmed with lace and around the bottom of the skirt there was a small cord piping of salvia to match the color of the embroidery and sewn in with the piping a little upstanding ruffle of narrow val lace.

names for this shade of red, this to our way of thinking, is the most acceptable, for the moment you see it, the mind pictures beds of brilliant salvia against the green lawn.

One lovely red voile had a ratine stripe at intervals of about an inch and was extremely pretty.

Tiger lily is another shade which makes up well, especially if the material be dotted Swiss. Organdie is used a great deal this year in conjunction with dotted Swiss and there is no end of ways in which it can be used. Some designers are very lavish in their use of it but we really think it is more effectively used in small quantities, a good example of which was one with narrow straps of organdie edged with val inserted in the body of the model, ending at the waist and groups of straps similarly trimmed, set in the skirt four or five inches above the hem. Here again was a black three inch crepe ribbon sash.

Two things one observes in these summer frocks, one is the plain bateau neck almost invariably untrimmed except for the tiniest cord that introduces a complementary color. This cord is sometimes repeated on the sleeves around the bottom of the skirt, or perhaps as a trimming where sleeves or skirt are slashed.

White Irish crochet about an inch wide was a new note one noticed on a fancy voile with little Egyptian characters arranged in squares and embroidered in salvia. This had short sleeves, slashed from bottom to top and edged with the lace and it was interesting to find that lace was also used around the bottom. Plain hems have been used so long that it is like going back (or is it going forward?) a decade or two to find lace trimming around the bottom.

Among the imported models several new things are introduced in the way of decoration. For instance in linen with drawn-work embellishment a sort of inser-

French model had a front panel made of row after row of these pretty petals. On another model, a bold design was carried out with coronation braid and large leaves of the material of the dress, but in a different color. Drawn work trims a great many of the French models.

Another summer offering will be the sports dresses designed for those who look on, rather than those who participate in the game. Baronet satin, so popular for summer sports skirts, is also used for sports dresses. One very smart model that we saw was made of white baronet satin with a sailor collar and V front cut rather low and filled in with a vestee of the same material, and wide Jenny sleeves of fisher-maid cloth in a bright green color. In case some reader is not familiar with the weave of fisher-maid cloth one might say that it is something like a coarse mosquito netting made of loosely woven silk threads. Another useful sports dress is

A UNIQUE WEDDING GIFT

This lovely fan was given to Princess Mary as a wedding present by the South African Ostrich Farmers. It is made of twenty superb ostrich feathers. The photograph shows the fan closed and the monogram and coronet in diamonds.

tion was made of atoms of the linen supplementing the drawn work. Some of these models were embroidered almost all over in a sort of cross or V-shaped stitch with two colors of woollen yarn, say black and white. One very unusual model had the neck cut in scallops, the top of the scallops being caught together with a little network of fine woollen yarn. The use of woollen yarn embroidery on cotton has survived longer than most such novelties do. Wool and sheer materials seem a very inconsistent combination, but inconsistent or not, there is more of it used to-day than there ever has been since it came into vogue; but one must admit that it is used with a great deal more discretion and therefore is more effective.

One of the favorite trimmings seems to be material cut in the form of petals and picoted around the edge. One made of Crepe Knit, which is a silk material with a very short loop surface. One model of this material was made with a middie of dark rich red color and a navy blue skirt. A metallic girdle was worn with this suit. Another baronet satin, which happened to be in a tiger lily tint, had long wide sleeves of white Georgette crepe embroidered in black.

Now most of the models mentioned have been of the dressy type, but the backbone of the summer wardrobe will be its gingham dresses. Small checks of dandelion and white and of lavender and white are to take the place of the black and white and the black and red of last year. Not entirely of course, because one still sees great quantities of both black and white and red and white, but these are new colors introduced this year with the sanction of Dame Fashion.

MAN'S achievements are intensified by machinery. We travel by machinery on land and sea and in the sky. A machine makes possible your morning newspaper. Would you know the correct time, a marvelous machine informs you, instantly.

The Lower
Plate

For nearly three quarters of a century Waltham has been inventing and perfecting machines for watch-building. Machines that have no counterparts elsewhere in all the world. Machines that perform true miracles of accuracy—turning and drilling and fashioning beyond the scope of any man's hand.

The machine illustrated builds the lower plate of a Waltham watch. Upon that plate it locates the foundation for the movement. One hundred and forty-one automatic operations are made by it with care beyond human brain and hand. Visitors never tire of watching its wonder working. And no other lower plate in any other watch is made like this Waltham plate.

When you buy a Waltham watch this machine is related to the famous Waltham accuracy. Its exclusive invention helps to make a Waltham watch exclusive. Its mechanical perfection is included in the purchase price. One more reason why the Waltham movement leads everywhere in true watch value.

It's Thrilling to Dye!

THE latest 'Thrill' in our house was introduced by little Sister Florence. She came home from school all agog with excitement. "Grandmother," she cried, "I was taught how to dye by the latest process to-day,—it's just wonderful!"

Dear old Grandmother smiled wistfully from her comfy old armchair. "My dear," she said, "I used to dye your Mother's little garments when she was a girl like you!"

"I know," replied the child very confidently, "but the wonderful Modern Dyes and the scientific Modern Method didn't exist then. Teacher explained it all to us."

And she rattled on, begging me to get her some of the 'Modern' fast, all fabric dye so that she could show me, her big sister, "all about it."

I went to the Drug Store and asked to see the Color Card of the Dyes Florence had mentioned. From a veritable galaxy of colors I chose Navy Blue and Pink, buying two cakes of each.

Returning home I studied the directions contained in each of the little packages. It was very easy to follow these simple directions and the next afternoon saw us started on an adventure that proved the most interesting and profitable experience I have ever had. Taking Florence's white voile frock which was still wearable but sadly yellowed by washing and weather, I weighed it and found that it tipped the scale at half a pound. I cut off half of the pink dye cake and put it away in its foil wrapper for future use. I then shaved the remaining half into a small enamelled saucepan of boiling water and stirred it until thoroughly dissolved.

A small washboiler was then filled with just enough water to cover the garment and brought to a boil. The pink dye solution was poured into the simmering bath. The dress was immersed and stirred with a stick taking care to spread out all folds. After ten minutes of this treatment the dress was lifted out with the stick and one-half cup of common table salt stirred into the bath. The dress was then put into the bath again and kept moving by use of the stick for twenty minutes.

At the end of that time it was taken out with the stick and rinsed in cold water until all excess dye had been washed off. After pressing the garment gently with the hands—not wringing it, mind you—it was hung up to dry, carefully spread out.

When nearly dry it was ironed on the wrong side.

It was perfectly surprising and delightful to see the result. Florence was enchanted. Mother was incredulous. Grand-ny, dear old soul, shook her head. "It used to take me most of a day to dye like that," she said.

"Yes, and a fretful, messy day, too," added Mother, who well remembered Grandmother's toil and trouble.

"At least it was an easy and delightful experience to-day," I said, and then I fell to thinking. There were twenty colors on that Color Card, and Mustard and Khaki made twenty-two. The Drug Store Clerk stated positively that I could make two thousand different shades in addition to a perfect Black and a true Navy Blue.

"Mother," I broke out at length, "I am going to dye my gray 'party' dress and an old pair of gray silk stockings. You see, it doesn't matter what kind of material it is, so I shall dye that cheap cotton waist and a few ribbons and ties and some woolen things as well."

Well, I did everything I intended to do and more. I bought some yellow, and using just three-quarters of the amount mentioned in the Direction Sheet, I dyed another white dress 'Canary Yellow.' Then I mixed two cakes of Sand and one-sixteenth of a cake of Orange and dyed some cheesecloth light Tan for the Sun-room curtains. An old brown silk dress of Granny's I dyed a perfect black by adding one-half cake of Navy Blue to the black dye bath to counteract the influence of the original dark brown of the material.

And I dyed and dyed and dyed, simply fascinated by the wonderful color combinations I was able to obtain, until the whole house was transformed and rejuvenated. Old materials of all kinds came under the spell of the wonderful new dye. My friends have caught the 'fever' and are vying with each other in beautifying their homes and wardrobes.

The expense is absolutely trivial compared with the saving and increased self-respect, for one is not conscious of that 'dyed over' feeling, the colors are so true, so lustrous, so even, so deep, so fast, so perfectly delightful and wonderful.

Little Sister Florence has caused quite a sensation, but the most amazed person of all is dear old Grandmother. As each new dyeing triumph is unfolded before her eyes she exclaims, "Land sakes! How the world does progress to be sure!"

"It's the new way," chimes in little Florence, "everybody doesn't know about this Dye yet."

And, judging by the number of people who want to know, it won't be long before 'everybody' will be dyeing for pleasure, appearance and economy.

I am sure that dyeing this way will never lose its fascination for our family—it's a 'thrill' that has come to stay.

These are intended for appliqué or patch-work, and may be attractively applied to a great variety of garments and household fabrics. Children's play frocks and small blouses, flower-like in gay shades of chambray and linen, are made doubly beguiling by a bit of an appliquéd rose or a bright poppy. Little aprons and bibs become things of charm. New interest is given to dainty curtains and nursery bed-spreads by the use of this simplest and most effective of decorations. Child Welfare Notes

Perhaps the fearful slaughter of the war and the tragic loss of young life may account for the increased interest which all nations are taking in the preservation of infant life. A writer in an American magazine says of recent efforts in the United States:

"It costs so little in money, time and energy to save mothers and babies that one wonders why this work is not and has not always been universal. It does not mean the expenditure of any vast sums of money, although it would be most desirable in every way if there could be in every county or township a hospital where women could receive the care they need.

"Whenever the infant mortality rate of any community is greater than seventy-five deaths to each one thousand babies born, it must be considered entirely unwarranted. This is not an ideal standard, for even in our largest cities it has

In the great rush to the cities that has occurred during the last ten years the doctors have not been left behind, and large numbers of rural communities are finding themselves without any opportunities for medical care. The call to the great centers of population is an insistent one; nevertheless the country and its people must be served.

"The problem is one that must be solved both by community and individual responsibility. The community must be stirred to action, and in this all the fathers and mothers of the country must bear their share of responsibility. The spirit of universal motherhood must be aroused in our American woman, and no woman can free herself of her responsibility in been found to be a practical accomplishment. As a matter of fact, there is no reason why half this number of babies should die before they reach the first birthday; but just as a standard to work on, seventy-five infant deaths per one thousand births may be taken to indicate a commonplace goal for our largest cities, where conditions of insanitation, lack of proper hygiene, poverty and the presence of vast groups of people of foreign nationalities present a problem that is difficult to solve. In country districts or rural communities, from thirty to fifty deaths of babies out of every thousand born should be taken as the highest permissible standard.

"In general, it may be said that in the West and in rural communities or small towns that do not have to meet the prob-

"The words by this writer apply also to Canada, where the value of studies in child welfare is realized in many communities. Our Women's Institutes are doing work of inestimable importance in this way—and the "youngest Canadians" are being guarded with a new sense of their value to a world which has seen wholesale destruction of homes and coun-

Miss M. L. C. Pickthall is known best in Canada by her first volume:—poems entitled "Drift of Pinions." A later edition of this work, "The Lamp of Poor Souls," added a few poems to the original volume. Then came a novel, "Little Hearts," written and published in England. Miss Pickthall is regarded by most Canadian readers as a poet, although her short stories have been appearing for years in the leading magazines. "The Century," for instance, published three or four of her stories during last autumn and the early winter. In "Everybody's Magazine," the story now published in book form—"The Bridge"—ran its course last year, and is now appearing in "The Sphere" (England). The sub-title proclaims this book as a story of the Great Lakes:—and, verily, Tallis Island, on and his two young cousins, Sombra and Salvator Luz. The girl rescues Maclear from the storm, and the love which springs up between Sombra and the man who has such bitter need of youth and hope, is one of tragic intensity.

The return of Maclear to a moral strength and sanity, in which he recognizes the wrong that he has done, seems to be accomplished through the love which, for Sombra, means utter belief and devotion. The ghoulish hate of old Ransome for Sal, in whom his disordered mind sees the gallant sailor who had won the girl whom Ransome loved, gives an eerie grimness to the final struggle. The characters are as remote from "Main Street" as from the Chambers novel of city life. There is a suggestion, in the passion of the human emotions and the which the most dramatic scenes of the story are enacted, is "girdled by Huron's throbbing and thunder." The lake may not be Huron, but the life is that of the remote regions of the lakes—those far from the well-known wake of the large steamers, which carry the summer tourists. Maclear, the hero of the story, has been guilty of commercial dishonor, with the excuse: "It's done every day." He has "saved" on a bridge contract, with the result that one span of the structure is defective; there is a fatal accident, and Maclear's own brother is one of the four who lose their lives. Maclear, in his desperation, takes refuge on Tallis Island, lonely and storm-swept, yet possessed of a savage beauty. There he finds the curious household of Morning House:—Mait Ransome, the demented old man, loneliness of the environment, of the spirit of the Brontës. It is a far cry from a Yorkshire moor to a tempest-tossed inland sea in Canada:—but Heathcliffe would have understood Mait Ransome.

"The Bridge" is unusual, both in plot and characterization, and, although called "A Story of the Great Lakes" is a poem in its most poignant paragraphs. (Published by Hodder and Stoughton, Toronto. Price, $1.75)

"My Pocket Beryl," by Mary Josephine Benson, is a book of poems by a Canadian woman who has an unusual imaginative gift which has an interesting tendency towards the fantastic. "Words" is one of the most memorable poems in YOUR BENEFACTOR.

The French are a wonderful people. It would be well for all of us if we knew more about them. As clinical physicians they rank high in the medical world. They are, and always were, superior to the Germans, but they do not advertise themselves. The French are greatly represented in that small company who have made all the difference to the history of the race.

There was Louis Pasteur. Did you notice in the Revue Internationale de la Croix Rouge, Nov. 15, 1921, that in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Pasteur, an Inter-allied Hygiene Exposition will be held in Strassburg from May to October, 1922, under the auspices of the Pasteur Institute of Paris, the University of Strassburg and the city of Strassburg. The exposition will include the subjects of city planning, public gardens, sewage, housing, personal hygiene, and other problems. So if you are one of the fortunate people who are "going over" this year, it may be that you will have the pleasure of visiting this Exhibition, which will probably be a memorable event.

HIS SHRINE.

In the crypt of the Pasteur Institute at Paris is a chapel which has become a shrine. Poor women of Paris, with their children, go there to pray on a Sunday afternoon. The chapel is a little one. In the centre is a railed enclosure round the tomb of Pasteur which is placed a little below the level of the chapel itself. All the walls and the ceiling are of mosaic work, portraying, with exquisite art and taste, the triumphs won by the man who sleeps below. Triumphs won, not for himself, but for the human family and the humbler creation. The artist has represented on these walls the animals whose diseases Pasteur studied and conquered. Witnesses to his knowledge and skill and to his devotion, the silk-worm, the fowls, —cows and sheep and oxen—and dogs and other domestic animals appear there. How was there time in the years of his life to accomplish so much?

HIS AMBITION.

But the greatest marvels of Pasteur's genius and the greatest thing he gained for mankind can scarcely be represented even by an artist. They are unseen.

In March 1863, Pasteur told Napoleon Third that his one ambition was "to discover the causes of putrid and contagious diseases." He has done it. Pasteur was born on December 27, 1822. When he died on September 28th, 1895, he left us living in a new world. We were no longer in hopeless darkness about contagious diseases. We knew how to defend ourselves against them, how to prevent them. And all this came about because Louis Pasteur was able to find out the cause of these diseases.

HIS HOME.

He was not a Doctor. He was not a favourite of Fortune. His father and his mother were descended from many generations of working folk. His father, Jean Joseph Pasteur, served in the Peninsular War, rose from the ranks, received the Cross of the Legion of Honour, and when the war was over, went back to his business. He was a tanner, as his father and grandfather had been before him. Louis Pasteur was the only son of his parents; he had three sisters for whom, as well as for his parents, he had the deepest and tenderest affection all his life long. Louis Pasteur was born in Dole, but his chief home was in Arbois,—"a little house with a tan-yard, close to the town and to the river." He went to the Arbois school, and perhaps the turning-point in his life came when the Principal of the School urged that he ought to study for a University degree. So he and another boy were sent to a boarding-school in Paris. He was very lonely. "I should get on all right" said Louis to the other boy, "if I could only smell the tan-yard." He could not stay. He could not stand the loneliness. His father came and took him away.

HIS DEGREE.

He went back to Arbois College and it was three years before he spread his wings and took flight again. He worked hard for his degree and passed, but without distinction. He, the greatest chemist perhaps, that the world ever saw, was marked "moderate" in chemistry. But he had heard Prof. J. B. Dumas lecture on Chemistry at the Sorbonne. Then he taught for a while, studied much chemistry and physics and mathematics. He had a genius for hard work.

HIS KINGDOM.

Then he spent twenty years in hot pursuit of the undiscovered secrets of ferments, the "diseases" of wines and grapes, and the diseases of silk-worms. Had he done nothing more he would have been a very great man. He saved the whole silk-worm and silk industry. France, Italy, Spain, Greece, Turkey, China, were all involved in it. To all these countries—to the world—and to you too he has been a great benefactor. Have you a thread of silk about you at this moment? Of course you have. If it had not been for Pasteur, there would be no silk for you, or for the world. He saved not only the silk and silk-worm trade, from extinction, but he saved the creature itself. Silk-worm disease threatened its total extinction.

A GREATER KINGDOM.

But this was only the introduction to his work. It was only the beginning. Faithful in these few things, he went on to rule a greater Kingdom. The light that dawned on his mind as he worked over the humbler creation grew brighter when at fifty years of age, he went on to the protective treatment of sheep, cattle, poultry and swine against their fatal diseases.

THE GREATEST KINGDOM.

He was sixty-three when he first used for man his protective treatment against hydrophobia. This kingdom of medicine he still rules. Every Nurse, every Doctor, every Research Worker, is a disciple of Pasteur. He is the benefactor of every patient.

THE LEADER.

Who can understand his genius? Who can fathom his mind? Can we tell what it was that made Shakespeare, or Newton, or Galileo what they were? Not so. What we can do is to learn from them. Lister caught the accents of Pasteur and became his co-worker. "To change the whole outlook of medicine and surgery, Heaven took and

A Delightful Test

To bring you prettier teeth

This offers you a ten-day test which will be a revelation to you. It will show you the way to whiter, cleaner, safer teeth.

Now we combat it

Dental science, after long research, has found two film combatants. Many careful tests have proved their efficiency. Modern authorities endorse them. Leading dentists everywhere urge their daily use.

A new-day tooth paste has been created, called Pepsodent. It complies with modern requirements. And these two great film combatants are embodied in it.

Clouded by a film

Your teeth are clouded more or less by film. The fresh film is viscous—you can feel it with your tongue. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. And it forms the basis of dingy coats.

Old methods of brushing leave much of that film intact. The film absorbs stains, so the teeth look discolored. Film is the basis of tartar. These coats, more or less discolored, spoil the luster of the teeth.

How it ruins teeth

That film holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So most tooth troubles are now traced to that film, and they are almost universal.

Made in Canada

Pepsodent CANADA
REG. IN

The New-Day Dentifrice

Endorsed by modern authorities and now advised by leading dentists nearly all the world over. All druggists supply the large tubes.

Two other effects

Pepsodent brings two other effects which authority now deems essential. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which may otherwise remain to form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's neutralizer for acids which cause decay.

An ideal diet, rich in acid-bearing fruit, would bring like effects. But Pepsodent brings them regularly.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube and watch these effects for a while. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

Then judge the benefits by what you see and feel. You will be amazed.

More About Eve's Garden

BY E. S. R.

I really have a passion for foxgloves! Perhaps it dates from my baby days when my favorite lullaby was "A fair little girl." You remember it, don't you?

"A fair little girl sat under a tree
Sewing as long as her eyes could see Then smoothed her work and folded it right
And said dear work Good-night! Good night!"

The tall pink foxglove bowed his head
The violet curtsied and went to bed
And good little Lucy tied up her hair
And said on her knees her evening prayer."

Anyway I love the tall foxgloves dearly, and can never have too many of their slim spires in my garden. How lovely they are in the early morning before the mists have quite lifted, their dainty fingertips gemmed with dewdrops! but it is on a moonlight night that I love them best. 'Tis then they turn the garden into a temple, their chaste white forms like tall candles, standing out clearly against the dark foliage of the trees.

Another flower I was ambitious to grow was the Oriental poppy. Years before an old English friend had brought me some seed from home, and gave such glowing accounts of their beauty, that I was very anxious to have them. But none of the seed came up, so I determined to try again in my new garden. By that time the narrow beds beside the path had been planted with rose bushes, and the space between the two rows struck me as being just the spot to sow those Oriental Poppies! !

It was almost as bad a mistake as the first Eve made, for like the consequences of that fatal apple, the trouble those poppies made seemed as if it would last forever. The first year they hardly showed at all, and I have no doubt I destroyed a lot of them the next Spring, thinking they were thistles, which they greatly resemble, but enough were left to completely overwhelm the roses, and though I dug them up painfully—they have terribly long roots you know,—they kept coming year after year from bits of root cuttings, and even now after ten years, I find an occasional plant trying to sneak into the old place.

In spite of this bitter experience, I persevered in the growing of Oriental poppies and in their Season there is nothing to touch them for gorgeous display. They look especially fine against a green background, and a big border of them at the foot of my grass terrace is a picture. I tried growing the new pink ones from seed, but out of about fifty plants, only two came true, but those two so exquisitely lovely that I shall take pains to increase my stock by every means in my power. I see there is a white one offered now, and am hoping to secure at least one plant of it this year. Oriental poppies do not transplant very well, unless they are shifted early in September, just as they start into growth for they die down altogether in the summer. By the way if you want a really magnificent mass of color to bloom just as the late tulips are passing, plant some good big clumps of Oriental poppies, and near them groups of the June Marguerite. They bloom at exactly the same time and the dainty white and gold of the marguerites makes a beautiful contrast to the bold form and glowing color of the poppies.

I consider this common dog-daisy or June Marguerite one of the indispensables in my garden, and much prefer their graceful waving blossoms to the larger stiff ones of the Shasta Daisy, though it of course has a place too. The chief recommendation of the former is its earliness, for it helps to fill in the rather bare time between the late tulips, and the Iris and Columbines. They last a long time too, quite to the middle of July, but you must watch and not let the seed ripen, for they spread like weeds. As a matter of fact they are weeds, as many a farmer knows to his sorrow, though the beauty of a meadow where there are more daisies than grass should almost justify their presence.

The biggest difficulty I had to face in those first years, was how to get water for my flowers. We hoped to be able to afford a water system some time, but on hot summer days I used to look at the sparkling blue lake almost at my feet and listen to the bubbling laughter of the mountain stream away over to my right; and think I must be a pretty poor sort of a gardener, or I would manage somehow to get a little of that cool refreshment for my poor limp flowers. I think it must have been in August of the second year that I got quite desperate, and arming myself with a hoe, and a determination to get water somehow or perish in the attempt I set off to try my luck at bringing water from the stream near the top of the garden. Did you ever try to divert the course of a mountain stream? I don't believe I've had so much fun since that ran at the foot of the orchard on the old farm where I was born.

Shall I ever forget that day? The sun was blistering hot, and when I saw how many small gullies lay between the garden and the stream. I nearly gave up in despair. But "where there's a will there's a way" must always be a gardener's motto and finally I contrived a scheme that worked. By nailing a couple of long, narrow boards into a V. shaped trough, I conducted the water over quite a wide gully, and had it where the rest of the course was down hill. But oh me! that ground was hard, and there were all sorts of obstructions: rocks and stumps to be avoided and hidden holes where the whole stream used to disappear for a time. But every foot gained meant water that much nearer to my perishing flowers so I stuck to it until, muddy but triumphant, I saw a small stream trickle into my rose beds, and knew I had overcome the drought at last.

For several years I conducted my primitive irrigating plant, and if there are any tricks that water can play while seeking its own level, that I did not have to meet and combat, I should be glad to know what they are. I lived in a perpetual state of wet feet and drapped skirts, and the way that water would find a new channel for itself and engineer a wash-out among my most precious seedlings, the minute my back was turned, was enough to try the temper of a Saint. It was especially exasperating just when one had changed into a white frock and slippers for the afternoon, to have someone yell "That water has broken away again, and is washing all those plants out of the ground!" No time to change into other shoes; nothing for it but to run at once to the rescue and with a piece of sod or a stone, stop the outlet, and start the water on its proper course again. Indeed "The Water" was sometimes almost as much a curse as a blessing, but it would have been quite impossible to have a garden on this hot sandy slope without it. So I wrestled with my little ditches until we finally were able to put in a reservoir on the main stream and pipe the water to the house and garden. There is a good fall which gives me plenty of force for sprinklers, but I go back to the old plan often, letting the water run from the hose into shallow ditches until the ground is thoroughly soaked, in preference to the usual plan of sprinkling. Sweet-peas, for instance, will come through the driest summer in fine shape, if, about once a week, you give them a thorough watering, by this method, letting the water run all night in a shallow drill along the edge of the row, and then as soon as the surface has dried a little, making a dust mulch by cultivating lightly either with a wheel hoe or one of those tools like a miniature harrow that are so useful in a garden.

Isn't it a lucky thing that Nature is such an artist that even from such ill considered planting she can make a pleasing picture? Surely she has had a more than kindly eye on my garden for some of my very loveliest effects are the result of neglect or reckless planting of things in order to avoid throwing them away. Fortunately too most plants are reasonable beings and do not object to an occasional shift of quarters.

"Well, the first thing is the roof. You could bring a bundle of shingles from the mill and mend it in the evenings."

"I could get a galvanized pipe for the chimney. There is a tinsmith's just where the ferry lands. And there is a sash and door factory in North Vancouver. I could get three window sashes and a door sent out by the train," added Frank with growing enthusiasm.

"Wouldn't it be nice to have a window on the west side of this room which will be our sitting room—three little casement windows?"

"The very thing, and I shall enjoy doing it all too."

THEY sat there talking, planning, building the little shack into the cosiest little home; until the shrill whistle of the ferry reminded them they had but a half hour to catch the five o'clock boat.

As soon as the roof was mended, doors and windows put in, a stove, a bed, two chairs—Frank was going to make a table—were installed, Mary and the boy were to move into the shack. Life seemed almost too happy.

That evening they talked it all over, and long after they were in bed they lay thinking and planning; and by the time they fell asleep each had a vision of a pretty comfortable, little home with a garden and a rustic fence.

By the end of the following week the place was ready for Mary and the baby. Frank had learned from the mill owner, Mr. Gifford, that the property had been owned by a young man who had been killed at the front, and that now it belonged to an uncle and was in the hands of a firm of lawyers in Vancouver. On enquiring Frank learned that it was for sale for two hundred dollars cash. The property consisted of two fifty foot lots with the two shacks. It had not occurred to Mary and Frank to buy, and they had not two hundred dollars in the world. It was not to be rented, and at first the firm would accept nothing but the two hundred cash. This was very distressing for two days, but at the second interview the firm agreed to accept a payment down of fifty dollars and twenty dollars a month until the sum was paid.

Saturday afternoon was set for the moving. Mary, baby, baggage, boxes, trunks, etc. were safely embarked on the little ferry. Frank was to meet them on the other side, and help them to the new home.

"Oh, Frank, we shall be so happy here," cried Mary as she walked through the little place. The new windows had been cut in the west side—three casement windows, low and wide admitting a grand view of the sea, Point Atkinson with its lighthouse, and beyond, the mountains on Vancouver Island, like ghost mountains on the horizon.

"Life could never be dull or commonplace for me with a view like that," said Mary. "One never saw such a view in Toronto."

"Nor in Montreal," added Frank.

"Oh, Frank, you didn't tell me that you had put new building paper on the walls."

"No, I wanted that to be a surprise, and I have another surprise. Come into the kitchen."

It was a small room, but Frank had blacklead the little second-hand stove that they had bought for eighteen dollars, until it looked like new. A shiny kettle was now simmering on it. Two sets of shelves and a shelf table that could be shut up when not in use he had also made.

"Oh, a sink! I would have been quite content with the tap outside, but it will be so much easier to do the work with this beautiful white sink. How did you get it put in?"

"I bought the sink, a new tap, and some pipe at a plumbing shop for twelve dollars, and the mill-wright came over and helped me put them in and connect them with the pipe outside. Wasn't it good of him? He is an awfully good sort and has been very kind to me. He lost his only son at the war and his wife is dead."

"Poor man," said Mary, "we must have him here some evening. He must be very sad at times. We are too happy to keep it all to ourselves."

"Here is our bedroom. It is very small, Mary."

"But there are two windows. That window wasn't there when I first saw the house, was it?"

"No, that is another surprise. I thought the room was too small for the three of us, but with plenty of window space it won't be so bad."

"That's true. How thoughtful you have been, but how did you get it all done in so short a time?"

"Oh I was not alone, for half the mill hands have been down here the last few evenings—some helping, others giving advice. They are all very interested in our coming. Last night Mr. Gifford said that his wife was very glad you were coming because there were so few people living near, and she hoped to have you for a friend."

A knock at the door took Frank away. "How are you, Mr. Gifford?"

"My wife has sent me to ask you all to come and have supper with us to-night, and so save your unpacking until tomorrow."

"My wife, Mr. Gifford."

"How do you do? I hope that you will come this evening, Mrs. Sidney."

"Thank you ever so much. It is very kind of you, and will save us no end of trouble. How very thoughtful of your wife."

Soon the little group were on their way along Fifth Avenue which led them to a pretty bungalow. Here they were most hospitably treated and made to feel that there would always be a welcome for them. This hospitality is one of the best characteristics of the west. They left early, for little Frankie was upset with the moving and had grown fretful, and then there were the beds to be made up. When they reached home the luggage had arrived and the transfer man had simply opened the door and put the things where he thought they would be needed. Bedding was unpacked, and soon the little family were sound asleep in their new home.

The next few weeks and months were very busy happy ones. Most of the spare time was spent on the home—their very own. Money was not too plentiful, and operations often had to be postponed until next pay day. Taking Frankie in her arms, Mary went to Vancouver; and bought a sufficient number of yards of factory cotton at fifteen cents a yard to make curtains for all the windows. At an art shop she bought a stencil poppy design, and suitable brushes and paint at a paint shop.

In the evenings when Frankie was in bed she and Frank stenciled brown poppies down one side and one end of each curtain. They made a wide hem at the top and bottom. The curtain rods, also fifteen cents each, were put through the top hems, so that the curtains could be drawn in the evenings, thus doing away with the necessity of blinds.

An end of rose-bud chintz left from the curtains in Mary's little pink and white bedroom in Toronto, helped to make the bedroom curtains. Instead of stenciling these Mary stitched a slip of chintz along the bottom of each about four inches from the hem. A frill for the top of the windows also had a strip of chintz stitched across it. The kitchen curtains were the same as the bedroom. The effect was very pretty and the total cost of materials in the neighbourhood of four dollars.

The walls were the next thing. Frank put up a narrow shelf in the living room on a level with the top of the windows. Some calomine was purchased. Below the shelf, light brown was used. The space above the shelf and the ceiling was tinted cream. The woodwork, the floor, and the homemade table they stained a rich brown. In time a blue and brown grass rug was secured for the floor. A spring stretcher bed (five dollars second

The Least Monotonous Work in the World

BY LILIAN D. MILNER

WHEN I told one of my friends I intended writing an article on this subject, she asked eagerly: "Whatever is it?" When I answered that it was housework, she exclaimed: "Housework! Why, that's the most monotonous work in the world! It's simply cooking, and washing dishes, and cleaning over and over again!"

Monotony is chiefly a point of view. Let the stay-at-home girl who thinks housework is one long round of doing the same things over and over again take a position as stenographer, and type steadily hour after hour, with, in offices where dictaphones are used, not even the welcome change to shorthand, and she will learn that there are more monotonous occupations than the much-despised but variable one of housework.

There never was a girl who hated housework and all it entailed more than I did. When I was just entering my teens I happened to overhear my mother, exasperated at something I had done, say to even the daily routine, but in a large office where I typed steadily all day long. I suffered from recurring attacks of nervous exhaustion. These necessitated my spending two or more months of every year away from the office, enforced holidays I could ill afford, for someone else was dependent upon my small salary. It was while I was visiting a friend during one of these enforced holidays that I acquired the point of view which made me realize that housekeeping was not, or need not be, a round of endless drudgery, and that office work could be a much more monotonous occupation.

My friend, a minister's wife, was the daughter of a university professor of French extraction, and had the French gift for cooking. Although she kept a maid I often found her out in the kitchen making wonderful dishes out of nothing—by "nothing" I mean things most folk throw away. When I watched her one day put some red apple peelings in a small saucepan to cook I thought she was carrying her econ-meeting here this evening. You can make that. The maid was off for the afternoon, and the minister's wife, realizing I would want to make the cake "all by myself," sat in a little sitting-room, opening out of the kitchen, and called out directions to me. When she told me to put in one cupful of sugar it didn't seem enough to me to make a big cake sweet; so I added another half cupful. I was so anxious to have that cake turn out just right and beautifully light that I doubled the quantity of baking powder! When I peeped into the oven a few minutes later I knew that I had done right in doing this—the cake was rising beautifully. A little later I took another peep. "It has risen ever so high!" I announced joyfully.

"Well, I'd leave it alone for about twenty minutes now," the minister's wife suggested. I went into the other room and sat with her, occasionally glancing at the clock in a veritable fever of impatience. I had the feeling of satisfaction that accompanies, or should accompany, every act of creation, even the humble one of making a cake. I imagined the compliments the minister would pay me on the lightness of my cake. I was going to make more things!—the vow was broken!

"I think you can take your cake out of the oven now," suggested my friend. The minister came in just at that moment, and I said to him; "Come and see what I have made!" They followed me out to the kitchen. I opened the oven door triumphantly; then stepped back! The cake—why, where was the cake which I had seen rising so beautifully? The baking-pan and the floor of the oven were covered with a crisp, dark brown mixture resembling toffee! The cake, about which I had made so much fuss, was a failure!

I flung myself into my friend's arms. "I didn't do what you told me!" I explained between sobs. "I put in more sugar and twice as much baking powder. You'll never let me make anything again! You'll never trust me again!" I wailed.

She laughed. She was a childless woman but she had an abundance of motherly understanding. "Why, child, of course I will! We'll clean up the oven and you can make another cake right away."

I did. She went out again to the little sitting room, and I followed the directions implicitly this time. The result was a cake which turned out so well that I didn't like to see people eating it!

I washed up all the utensils I had used for the cake-making right away, because the minister's wife explained that if they were let stand they would be much harder to wash, and in the meantime they would attract flies. She had a very old, exquisite tea-set, which was used only on special occasions, and which she washed herself, not caring to risk any of the pieces being broken. The efficient way in which she performed this prosaic task made me see that there were pleasant ways of even washing dishes.

One of my young friends said to me recently, with almost a note of protest in her voice: "You wash dishes as if you liked doing it!" I returned; "But I do!"

She retorted; "Well, if you have the sort of mind that enjoys washing dishes, I feel sorry for you!"

When I made no reply, she continued; "Of course, one of these days you won't have to do your own housework, will you?"

I smiled. "I don't want to ever give up doing my own housework," I said.

If writers, painters and musicians did not hold ever before them the vision of their completed work, they would find the preparatory work very monotonous. The housewife must do likewise, and she should experience the thrill which accompanies completed creative work several times a day, each time she surveys a room set in order, or a table before a meal.

Instead of writing, or painting, or playing a musical instrument for hours on end, she can go from dish-washing to bed-making, from bed-making to cooking. Hers is an ever-changing employment, and it is because of this that I call housework "the least monotonous work in the world."

Here are cabbages for salads and chow-chow and everything else where the refreshing vegetable can give variety to the menu.

a friend: "That child will never be any use to me around the house!" I am afraid that speech was at least partly responsible for a vow I registered about that time that I would be a teacher, or stenographer, when I grew up, and I'd never do any housework—never!

The immediate result of that vow was my arrival home from school one day with the little white apron and sleeves I wore to cookery class. I joyously informed my horrified family that I wouldn't need them any more! My mother, upon making enquiries, was informed by the principal of the school that, while he had no complaint to make re my work in other classes—I had, in fact, been recommended for a certain much coveted scholarship—the cookery teacher felt that it was a waste of time trying to teach me something I evidently could not assimilate.

I became a stenographer—not in a small office where one has changes of work in omical methods too far, but when I saw the little glass of pretty pink jelly which resulted I was simply dumbfounded! When she explained to me how that little economy would save her opening up a fresh sealer of fruit, because she would use the jelly in a trifle for dessert the following day, I began to see that the phrase "Domestic Economy" stood for something.

Another day I arrived home from a walk in time to see my friend cut up a large plain cake she had made, and, by using different icings and fillings, make four different kinds of cake for an afternoon tea. I realized then that one could use brains in housework and get some joy out of it. When I saw the different things the minister's wife could make from a plain biscuit dough foundation, my enthusiasm burst its bounds. "Let me make something, too!" I begged.

My friend said; "Why, certainly. I want a cake for a junior missionary circle the volume, and shows the writer's passionate love for the material with which she works:—the craftsman's true fondness for his tools. Mrs. Benson's sense of color is shown at its best in her descriptive poems. Among those called "contemplative" the most striking is "Hereditude and Ego," from which we quote the verses:

"I with the seashell-sounding heart
Have scarcely seen a boat,
And I who tent on the plain apart
Have sight of hills remote.

"Of lordly seas and mountains grand
My blood has sudden sense,
Although I live afar inland—
With sky for recompense.

"My father was a sailor free,
My mother from the hills,
And hauntingly they share with me
My desert's joys and ills."

This volume is published in Toronto by McClelland and Stewart.

Anyone who read "Marqueray's Duel," by Anthony Pryde, will not need persuasion to read "An Ordeal of Honor" by the same author. Mr. Pryde has given us in the hero, Charles Auburn, a character somewhat resembling Marqueray, wilful to perversity, charming in the whimsical changes of mood and possessed of a fortitude which, in Marqueray, was somewhat lacking. The tragedy in which Auburn is involved, and in which he appears to have been his father's murderer, brings out the finer and sterner side of his character and places a severe strain on the loyalty of his young fiancée, Dorothy Carminow. The mystery of the murder is very ingeniously concealed throughout years of Auburn's imprisonment. However, it would be unfair to say anything of the denouement in a story, so dramatic. The style of this writer, vivid, tense and yet not sensational, is as captivating as in his earlier work:—and the Carminow household is a remarkable picce of characterization. The book is published in Toronto by the F. D. Goodchild Company. Price, $2.00.

"The Rider of Golden Bar," by William Patterson White, is, as one might easily guess, a tale of wild adventure, with rough riders and frequent "shootings" to enliven the scene. Hazel Walton, the heroine, is really a womanly young person; but there are so many villains in the neighborhood that Hazel is obliged, more than once, to resort to the gentle art of self-defence, all the way from kicking a ruffian on the knee-cap to holding him at a distance with a loaded gun. However, the hero, Bill Wingo, is an honest citizen who comes to her rescue in chivalrous fashion and, although there are the usual misunderstandings the course of true love finally emerges from the rapids into smooth water. The book is published in Toronto by the Ryerson Press. Price, $1.75.

trained a 'pure scientist,' who had never done an operation nor written a prescription; a man who had to screw up his courage even to look at some of the ordinary sights of a hospital; took this non-medical man of science, and set him to be head of all the heads of the medical profession, to have them all obedient to his teaching, and proud of the very sound of his beloved name. It is near twenty years since he died; and the work of these years has been done as it were in obedience to him, and in memory of him. The whole world is well aware that he has availed more than the physicians and surgeons of his time for its health and happiness. He was set apart from them, that he might be the leader of them; and he led them into that kingdom which they longed for, but could not find for themselves. — *Stephen Paget, 1914.

THE LATE ROBERT GLASGOW, M.A.

An eminent Canadian publisher, who died suddenly in New York recently in his forty sixth year. The late Mr. Glasgow was a native of Sherbrooke, Quebec, and rendered national service to his native land by publishing the historical series, "Chronicles of Canada." In recognition of his services to the cause of history he received the honorary degree of M.A. from Yale University hand) covered with blue and brown chintz served as a lounge by day and an extra bed, in case of a visitor, by night. Two Chinese grass chairs and some bookshelves completed the furniture for the present. Of course a small stove would have to be installed next winter.

The bedroom was the next to be done. When buying their bed they bought a good mattress and spring, and fastened four legs to it until Frank had time to make a pretty frame of square, wooden posts, enamelling them white. The woodwork and table were painted white; the floor stained brown; the walls calomined canary yellow; and the ceiling and border white. The kitchen floor and woodwork they stained brown, and the walls they lawn. The rest of the land was made into a kitchen and flower garden.

It was a beautiful evening in August and the little garden was already beginning to be worthy of the name, and Frank was showing the mill-wright, who had been having supper with them, some raspberry canes which had done remarkably well.

"Those are two fine wild cherries you have there, Sidney. Are you going to graft them?"

"How, why, what do you mean?"

"I mean turn them into tame cherries."

"I should like to do so if I knew how."

"Next March you ask Mr. Gifford for some cuttings from his cherries and I will show you."

"It is strange that you should say all this to me, for Mary and I have never thought of it in that light. All I know is that we have been very happy—almost too happy—and that the work we have done has given us any amount of fun and enjoyment."

The days and weeks sped swiftly on. Summer was over and winter had settled down with its long, rainy days, but the family were busy and happy as ever. There was still work to be done in the garden between deluges of rain, and when there were no intervals, there was the cosy little sitting room with books, sewing, etc.; and, above all little Frankie, who had grown into a most entertaining young man and a great solace to Mary just now; for Frank was very busy at the mill, often returning after supper to help the owner with the books. Frank took a keen interest in the work and had made himself so useful that Mr. Gifford found him indispensable. It was a disappointment to both when Frank was obliged to spend an evening away from home, but there was Frankie's future to be thought of.

a year ago when they first came to live here. Frank was coming towards them, his arms full of bundles, for he had been to town, and had called at the post office on his way back.

"Any letters, Frank?"

"One for you, dear."

"Oh, it is from Aunt Martha. She hasn't written to me for years. What can it be about? Let's see."

Mary read it and gave it to Frank, keeping the envelope.

She pondered the address. 'Fifth Avenue, Hollyburn P. O., B. C.' What impressions could her aunt have of their home? Aunt Martha, her father's sister, prim and proper, and one who had never knocked about the world; would she get a shock when she saw this place? Well if she did Mary determined it should be a pleasant shock, and a great wave of longing for the sight of somebody connected with her old life swept over her.

"Sunday, May the twenty-eighth," read Frank, "Why that is to-morrow. She says she is coming to stay for a little while. Great Caesar, Mary! Where are you going to put her?"

made yellow. All this, of course, took time and work; but it brought great joy to these two homemakers.

The other shack, consisting of one room with a window and door in it, when it had been made rainproof, furnished a good woodshed and trunk room.

The garden was an ever ending source of joy to Mary and Frank. They got a man with a team of horses to plow up the two lots, leaving one or two little fir trees, some wild cherry trees, and a beautiful dog-wood. The fence they made of cedar poles, with the bark still on, which gave a rustic effect. Over the gate Frank built an arch, and at the foot they planted rambler roses. In part of the ground was planted clover and grass seed for a

"Oh, thanks, I should like to know how that's done."

"You have done wonders with this little place, Sidney, and made it a home to me and the boys at the mill. You and your wife have been very kind."

"I am glad if you feel that way, about it, but for myself I am not conscious of having done anything except a great deal of delightful work."

"I am an old man now, and my wife has been dead a long time, since when I have knocked about this western Canada. I have worked in mines; I have gone out fishing; and I have worked in the forest. It is to be a great country; but, to my mind, there is nothing so valuable in it as the homes, such as yours."

Each month they went to Vancouver; and, after keeping out enough money for monthly expenses, deposited the rest to their account at the bank. Living expenses were small and the bank account was growing steadily. The home was all paid for. All this gave them a feeling of contentment and security; for although happiness is not to be obtained through money, the lack of it is sometimes very distressing.

ONE Saturday afternoon in May, Mary, with Frankie toddling at her side, walked slowly down the narrow path known as Fifth Avenue, hedged in by lovely growing things, all new and beautiful as they had been

"Why, on the lounge in the sitting-room."

"On the lounge in the sitting-room! Your Aunt Martha!"

"Why of course. It may be a bit of a shock to her, but we'll not let her go until we make her appreciate some of the benefits of living as we do."

"Well, Mary, I think you have your task cut out for you, but you can see farther than I can. You transformed this shack, and perhaps you can transform Aunt Martha."

"I do not wish to transform her, but only to let her have a glimpse of how happy we are."

The names of the most eminent of all choirmasters, Palestrina and Bach, have been already mentioned. Though he never entered the priesthood and was a married man, Palestrina, born near Rome in 1526, was capellmaster at St. Peter's and other churches of the Eternal city. He constantly encountered difficulties because of the opposition of clerical singers to taking direction from a layman. When after the Council of Trent the authorities of the Catholic Church resolved to make reforms in church music, which had become sadly vulgarized, Palestrina was the man entrusted by Pope Sixtus V and afterwards by Pope Gregory XIII with the task of restoring its devotional beauty and dignity. How well he succeeded in the task is shown by the fact that his music is still sung by all the great choral organizations of the world both Protestant and Catholic; and represents the ultimate ideal in lofty expression.

The greatest of all the men who followed the noble calling of choirmaster or capellmaster was Johann Sebastian Bach who was born in 1685 and died in 1750. Though as a young man he served in various capacities in German capitals the latter part of his life was spent in Leipzig, when he composed an enormous number of compositions for the churches with which he was connected, and definitely established the polyphonic school of composition. During the past two or three years the vogue of Bach despite the fact that almost two centuries have elapsed since he died has been steadily on the increase. This winter I think, taking it in the aggregate, I have heard more of Bach's music, than that of any other composer.

I suppose these old fellows experienced just the same troubles that the average ambitious choirmaster of to-day has to contend with; troubles which are not lessened when, as often happens, in some of our smaller cities the choirmaster is a lady. Probably they could not see eye to eye with their clerical chiefs at times; and had to fight for their ideas firmly but tactfully. Great tacticians they must have been to accomplish what they did in the way of progress; for the choirmaster who is not born with a sense of tact has a hard row to hoe; what with clergymen who have their own ideas and recalcitrant singers, who get huffy and are slack in the matter of practice. Unfortunately tact does not always go hand in hand with ambition. But in addition to tact and ambition, the choirmaster must have personality. When he rises to be the conductor of an eminent choral society where public rather than congregational support is an essential of success, personality is a tremendously important factor, but it means much at all times. The other day I was reading an article by George M. Brewer, a member of the Canadian College of Organists, in which he held that personality was all-vital in choir achievement, great and small. His theme was "What's Wrong With Church Music?" and he argued that church musicians should be personalities. He holds that it is this quality that enables the choir master to exact from singers really great music and interest the congregation in it; instead of wasting time on superficialities.

When one comes to consider how much influence a choirmaster wields over musical taste, especially in the smaller centres where the church choir is the actual and indeed the only fountain head of musical activity, the question of the personality of the choirmaster becomes of the highest importance. Mr. Brewer holds that if a man has the requisite strength of personality he is bound to make the congregation enjoy the best music. Such a man is entitled to the confidence of those in authority; if he is sincere he will demand it, and what is more get it. "What is paramount," says Mr. Brewer "he will compel all who come in contact with him in person and through his music to enjoy—I don't hesitate to add, to become enthusiastic, over that music. It all devolves around personality. Such a personality will make classical music popular, a mission surely of the highest."

Fashions for Summer Days

The days of sunshine and holiday sport are near, and every woman wants to have the latest and daintiest designs for herself and the small persons of the household. There are many fashions, but the PICTORIAL REVIEW includes them all; and you cannot make a mistake, either in smartness or suitability, if you use the PICTORIAL REVIEW patterns.

"But are your pans close enough to the fire?"

"Yes, because it's HEAT that does the cooking, and that Long Blue Chimney makes the greatest amount of heat and drives it directly against the pans."

THE Long Blue Chimney is the feature that has made the New Perfection Oil Cook Stove famous. This chimney keeps the cooking pan away from the flame for very good reasons. It provides just the right space for every drop of oil to burn into clean, intense heat. At the same time it makes a strong draught, which sends the heat, quivering-hot, right up against the utensil.

"Clean heat's the thing"—the first thing—one looks for in a stove. Over 4,000,000 users have found that the New Perfection gives just the right heat for every kind of cooking—steady, dependable heat—no soot, no smoke, no disagreeable odor.

And what a comfort to find an oil stove that lights and heats instantly! Touch a match to the wick of the New Perfection and the flame responds immediately. When the flame is once set, it stays set. It's the Long Blue Chimney that makes the speedy, steady flame possible.

Your local dealer will gladly demonstrate the New Perfection. See the New Perfection Oven and Warming Cabinet, too. Ask for a copy of the New Perfection booklet.

The Chronicles of Eve's Garden

worthlessness of some tree, I have a great time wheedling him into cutting it right out instead of top-grafting. The first Eve seemed to have more influence over her man, for sometimes I have to give Adam a quid pro quo in the shape of one of my beautiful birch trees, which I have by dint of much coaxing kept till now in various parts of the orchard. I do not give them up without a struggle, but my poor flowers do suffer so for lack of sunshine that when all else fails I allow him to cut down a birch in an out of the way corner as the price of a little more open space for my garden.

long they have lived their lives out under the sky, and how long, long after I am gone and forgotten they will remain. Surely in some former incarnation I must have been a dryad and lived in a tree, and truly I should like to be buried beneath one "by some unfrequented garden-side" like old Omar. Did you ever see a little poem by Joyce Kilmer called "Trees?" I clipped it from a newspaper some years ago, and often whisper it to myself.

"I think that I shall never see
A poem lovely as a tree—
A tree whose hungry mouth is pressed
Against the earth's sweet flowing breast

A tree that looks at God all day
And lifts her leafy arms to pray
A tree that may in Summer wear
A nest of robins in her hair.

Upon whose bosom snow has lain
Who intimately lives with rain.
Poems are made by fools like me,
But only God could make a tree."

It is interesting to trace one's actions to their source. When I was quite a child I saw a fine display of Canterbury Bells and fox-gloves, and their beauty so impressed me, that the very first Spring after we bought this place I sowed seed of these two things, and the next year had a wide curving border of them to outline my garden. It looked perfectly charming, and being my very first achievement in the gardening line I was immensely proud of it. Of course I confidently expected to have an even finer show the next Summer, so you can imagine my bewilderment when not a single Canterbury Bell put in an appearance. I simply could not understand it; the true inwardness of a bi-ennial not having been demonstrated to me yet. But the next Summer along they came, scores of them, wherever they had happened to escape the hoe; from self-sown seed, and I learned that Canterbury Bells belong to that class of plants, whose "flower once blown forever dies."

I fancy this climate is particularly adapted to seed growing, for every flower seems to perfect seeds of high germinating power. For years, I never sowed any more seeds of those two flowers, yet always had all I wanted to fill my borders until I began to graduate into a real gardener, and wanted special varieties to carry out some cherished scheme. Since those days I have eliminated all the dark majenta pink fox-gloves, and grow only the white and palest pink ones, though last year I had some new spotted ones that were rather striking.

Why is it that men have such a mania for cutting down trees? It would almost seem as if they could not have descended from monkeys, for if they had, surely some dim survival of the days when trees were their only home, would stay their hands.

I have seen the most ruthless destruction of trees! One case in particular nearly broke my heart. There is or was a beautiful mountain stream in a little valley, or gully—as we say out West—quite near my garden. Indeed we carried all our drinking water from there the first few years we lived here, and many an hour I spent exploring its lovely length. The banks were covered with beautiful young trees, tall slender birches, cedars that were perfect pyramids touching the ground, and dark symmetrical firs, while dozens of different varieties of shrubs clustered about them. The rocky sides of the gully were jewelled with moss and many a hot summer day I sat beside that stream, fairly green with envy and covetousness. What wouldn't I have given to have had it on our land? But, at any rate, we could all enjoy its beauty and we did till the land changed hands, and the new owner sent a man to clear it, and he cut every single tree along that stream, though the sides of the gully were nothing but rocks and could not possibly be used for growing anything. It was one of the cruellest sights I ever saw.—That lovely cool green hollow transformed into a waste of shrivelling trees, and the poor stream that had so long laughed its way through dappled shadow exposed to the glaring day! I nearly cried my eyes out, and quite disgraced myself by flying at the offending owner and telling him what I thought of him.

"Things of slow growth are precious" and what more precious than a tree? All trees, but more especially those that are of Nature's own planting and nurture have a peculiar fascination for me, a sort of awe inspiring quality. They are so wonderfully alive and seem so wise and kind, and I am always thinking of how

The pergola with roses

SOME years ago the fashion was set of choosing a Sunday in May as "Mother's Day," in honor of our maternal parent, and the carnation was chosen as the suitable flower to be worn. Then a resourceful person suggested that a white flower should be worn in memory of a departed mother and a pink flower as a tribute to the living. The custom became established. The florists were enthusiastic over it, and now, early in the month of May, "Mother's Day" is widely advertised. Some of the mothers, however, did not approve of certain aspects of this observance, and I heard a canny Canadian (with Paisley blood in her veins) say, not long ago:

"It's too much foolishness altogether. I'm fond of the flowers and think the woman who started this Mother's Day carnation meant well. But the idea is a one-sided affair. Why not include the whole family and have an Old Home Sunday? It's the home idea, not the mother idea, that needs emphasis to-day. We hear too little about what the father means to the home. It's bad for the fathers to be ignored, but the world's a silly place to-day. There used to be a song: 'What is Home without a Mother?' There is another side to it. 'What is mother without a Home?' I'd like to have it a Home Day and a Home Sunday. I don't want a carnation on any particular day, because I tried to bring up my children right and give them a good home training. Their father helped in the home work and kept the home fires burning. Why should he be left out? My boy, David, gets his engineering skill from his father and the youngest boy and his 'Daddy' are together in their wireless experiments. The boys know better than to send me flowers in May with a foolish card. David writes to us every week and Rose, too,—though she's away off in Vancouver."

"But Mother's Day means a letter," said a younger matron. "Some men who haven't written home for months send a line to their mothers during the first week of May."

"Well, perhaps that's better than none at all," said the mother of Paisley descent. "But it's little I'd think of any son who'd write home only once a year. I tell you, I don't like the Mother's Day idea, at all. It makes a display of what ought to be only a duty—and a joy, as well."

This reminded me of a letter recently received from the Women's Institute at Port Colborne, which told of a "party" which must have been an enjoyable affair. The programme was prepared by the grandmothers, each of whom received a flower as a mark of appreciation. There were two choruses by fourteen grandmothers:—"The Old Oaken Bucket" and "Love's Old Sweet Song." There were also duets, such as "Whispering Hope" and "Carry Me Back to Ole' Virginny." Of course there was a dialogue and there was a kind of adaptation of Arnold Bennett's "Milestones" in which the grandmothers of three generations were represented. It must have been a joyous meeting for both audience and entertainers, and I think a "Grandmothers' Programme" might be given by many an organization with great success.

FOR many years men have been informing women that they (the women) are extremely vain and loquacious and that their brethren, on the contrary, are "big" in their ideas and ways, with no jealousy, no vanity and an immense capacity for silence. Of course, we knew that in private life men are very much like women—just as fussy about their own importance and quite as given to talking. However, we thought that in public affairs there might be a difference. Man might, in political, literary or artistic circles, manifest an immense superiority, in the matter of modesty and reticence. Women are discovering that public debate, as managed by man, is just as tiresome as any of the feminine organizations, while the chairman who fails to pin bouquets upon himself is yet to be found.

So reflected a melancholy band of women, who recently attended a dinner at which, it was understood, there were to be several inspiring addresses. The chairman, on that occasion, refused to remain in the chair, mounted the rostrum and discoursed for more than thirty minutes. There were several speakers for the evening, but only two of them (the one woman speaker, and a university professor) observed the time limit and kept to ten minutes. Their speeches were both graceful and effective. The evening dragged wearily along and still we waited for "the" speaker. As the hour was nearing midnight, this gentleman was called upon for an address. He firmly and coldly declined to make any remarks, stating that he knew he would not be forgiven if he spoke at that hour. He was quite right in his refusal, but those who know how acceptable and stimulating his speeches prove, can hardly forgive that egotistic chairman and certain other tedious gentlemen for taking all the joy out of the evening. It was assuredly a badly-managed and clumsily-staged affair, and the women who attended were quite disgusted with the deadly dullness of it all.

I had the wisdom to leave before ten o'clock, and so missed the worst of the boredom. Still, it was dismal enough to be defrauded of what one really wanted to hear.

"It serves you right," said Araminta, who scorns all clubs and considers them the last word in desolation. "You shouldn't expect men to know how to manage things of that sort. They are far more conceited than we are and love to hear themselves talk. But it's too bad that So-and-So did not give an address, for he's worth while. That young chairman needs a lesson in politeness."

"And speakers should be given a time limit—and obliged to observe it, even at the point of the sword—or the gong."

The Woman Who Wished She Could Play the Piano

And How She Found an Easy Way to Turn Her Wish Into a Fact

A YEAR or so ago this woman didn't know one note from another. To-day she plays the piano—entirely by note—better than many who have been playing for years. Here she tells how she learned and why it was so easy. Thousands of others, from school children to men and women of 50 to 60, have also learned music in the same easy way.

FROM the time I was a child, I have always had a yearning and longing to play the piano.

Often I felt that I would gladly give up half of my life if some kind fairy would only turn my wish into a fact. You see, I had begun to think I was too old to learn, that only some sort of fairy-story magic could give me the ability to play. I was 35 years old—and the mother of a small family—before I knew one note from another.

Again and again, parties and other social gatherings have been all but spoiled for me. I could enjoy myself until someone suggested music or singing; then I felt "left out"—a lonesome wall flower—a mere looker-on. Instead of part of the party, I was missing half the fun. The way I have suddenly blossomed out in music (almost overnight, you might say) has been a big surprise to all who know me, and to myself as well. My friends seem to think it must be that I had a previously undiscovered genius for the piano. But if there was any genius about it it wasn't on my part. But in the lessons I took—a new and simplified method that makes it remarkably easy for anyone to add music or singing to their daily lives. Anyone anywhere can now learn to play any instrument or learn to sing just as easily as I did. All the hard part, all the big expense, all the old difficulties, have been swept away by this simple new method.

I learned entirely by home study—in my spare time—from fascinating Print and Picture lessons that make everything so simple and easy that one simply can't go wrong on them. I call it a short-cut way to learn—it is so much simpler and so entirely different from the old and hard to understand methods.

Within a year after I took my first lesson, I began teaching my two little girls to play—using exactly the same lessons I myself had studied. And I noticed that both of them seemed to be getting along better than any of their playmates who have private teachers. In addition, I am saving the money it would cost to have a private teacher—I figure it would cost at least $3 to $5 a lesson to have a teacher whose instruction could compare with that contained in the printed lessons from the U.S. School. Yet, from the first lesson to the last, the total cost of learning the way I did averaged only a few cents a lesson.

My only regret is that I didn't know of this really wonderful method years before. The ability to play is such a great comfort. No matter how much I am alone, I never get lonesome—I can always turn to my piano for amusement. I am never at a loss for a way to entertain callers. I no longer feel that I am "out of it" at social gatherings. Do you wonder that I so gladly recommend the method that has brought me so much pleasure and satisfaction?

This woman's experience is by no means unusual. Over 250,000 others—from school children to men and women of 50 and 60 have learned to play their favorite instrument or learned to sing in the same way this woman did. Largely through the recommendations of satisfied pupils, we have built up the largest school of music in the world.

Whether for beginners or advanced pupils, our method is a revolutionary improvement of the old and hard-to-learn methods used by private teachers, and our method is as thorough as it is simple and easy. We teach you in the only right way—teach you to play or sing entirely by note. No "trick" music, no "numbers," no make-shifts of any kind. Yet it is a short cut method, simply because every step is made so simple and clear and the total cost averages a few cents a lesson, with your music and everything included.

When learning to play or sing is so easy, why continue to confine your enjoyment of the music to mere listening? Why not at least let us send you our free book? Just now we are making a special offer that cuts the cost per lesson in two—send your name now, before this special offer is withdrawn. Increasing your profits

THE price you get for your farm produce depends on the market at the time you sell.

But you can make extra money if you cut the cost of production. Time saved on the farm cuts the costs just as it does in business. Time saved means more things done per man, or less men to do the same amount of work. Either way swells the year's profits.

To save time you should know the time. Time is saved in minutes, and the minutes grow into hours. A handy, dependable Westclox will save its cost in extra work accomplished the first month.

So clock your farm. Westclox all around. In the barn, in the dairy, the workshop and the house. You'll be surprised the time they'll save. The cost is low. America, a steady going, reliable timepiece and alarm, at $2.00. Others up to $5.00.

The next few hours were very busy ones, trying to make things as comfortable as possible for Aunt Martha.

Sunday morning dawned, beautiful and bright, with the air full of song and sweet scent. Frank crossed the inlet to meet the ten o'clock train, while Mary was busy at home putting little touches here and there to make everything look as pretty as possible. On the little verandah, now nearly covered with honeysuckle, Frankie was taking his morning nap. Inside, the table was spread with beautiful white linen and silver—wedding presents—and a chicken was sizzling in the oven. Mary looked at everything and felt proud. A click of the gate and voices! They must be back.

"Oh, Aunt Martha, I am glad to see you. It is so long since I have seen anyone from home."

"And I am glad to be here. I felt I must come to see you all. I met Mr. Gifford in Toronto when he was there on business, and hearing that he came from Hollyburn, naturally the conversation turned to you. Of course he knew you and told us all about the dear little home you had made. He spoke so highly of Frank. I believe he loves him; at which I am not surprised. Oh this is little Frankie. We must not wake him. He is very like your father; isn't he, Mary?"

"Yes, I have often thought so." When dinner was over and Aunt Martha had been shown everything about the place they sat under the dogwood tree and had a long talk.

"Your and Frank's letters have always been so bright and happy, and your father and I have always felt contented about you, but none of them gave us much idea of your circumstances, and we did not understand until we met Mr. Gifford."

"Yes, Aunt, Frank and I thought this would be a bit of a shock to you."

"Indeed it has not. I think it is a delightful life, and I have already caught the spirit of the country, and, old as I am, I have just been wondering if you could find me a shack to 'do up' too, but first of all I am going to take charge here, and let you and Frank go out together sometimes. You have been tied up with this son of yours for too long."

"Oh, Aunt, you are very good, and how did you know that it was hard to be tied up with a baby?"

"I have not lived all these years among human beings for nothing."

The next days and weeks were very bright. They all went on little trips by motor and boat to show Aunt Martha the beauties of the country, and often Aunt Martha took charge of Frankie, while Frank and Mary went out together—a pleasure, the sweetness of which can only be appreciated by those who have been long tied up with young children.

Toward the end of June Aunt Martha found a pretty little bungalow near the sea, with a garden and some well grown fruit trees. Here she spent most of her time digging, planting, weeding. It was very nice for Frank and Mary to have her near, and to see her so happy in her garden, but the best was yet to come.

One day towards the end of July Mary came home from the post office radiant. Frank was not at home. She must tell him her good news. Should she go up to the mill and find him? No, that would never do, but how could she wait! She had received a letter from her father saying that a very successful investment had made it possible for him to retire from business, and that by the time she got this letter he would be on his way to Vancouver where he hoped to spend the rest of his life. Soon! in a few days, she would see her dear father again, and he would live here always. The joy seemed too great. Would Frank ever come home! He was already half an hour later than usual. At last she heard him whistling down the path.

"Oh, Mary, I have the grandest news!"

"Oh, Frank so have I."

ous place or the membership card with receipt for the fees of the current year shown.

Question—What skin or leather articles are made by Girls in Institutes?

Answer—Gloves, slippers, sachets, bags, mitts, waistcoats, muffs, card cases.

Question—Who is the Editor of "Home and Country?"

Answer—MRS. NUGENT HARRIS. It was founded by Miss Alice Williams.

Question—WHAT IS THE NEW Canadian Badge like?

Answer—The body of the design is the new Canadian Coat of Arms. It is quite a sumptuous badge and is worthy of the admiration it gets. Miss Eliza Campbell the Treasurer of the Federated W. I. of Canada, Fredericton, N. B., keeps the stock of pins.

Question—When there is a printed yearly programme, is it not helpful to have it in form of a leaflet with information about the Institute movement?

Answer—There is really no need of such a leaflet. Much useful information about the activities and organization of the local Institute can be printed on the outside of the programme.

Question—How often should there be a meeting of the Executive or the Directors?

Answer—That depends upon your Constitution and on the amount of business to be transacted. It is usually advisable to hold a meeting very soon after the regular monthly meeting in order to plan details of the next meeting and to carry out instructions of the Institute as set out at the meeting. There is usually something to be arranged at once. The frequency of the Directors' meetings also depends on how active the Standing Committees are.

Question—Who was the first organizer of Women's Institutes?

Answer—Mrs. Laura Rose Stephen, now of Huntingdon, Quebec, Convener of Standing Committee on Agriculture Federated Women's Institutes of Canada. She worked for the Ontario Government under, I think, Mr. George Creelman, but she will tell us if that is not right.

Question—Are there Women's Institutes in Australia?

Answer—Not that I know of, although there is a great interest in our work. New Zealand has a few of recent origin.

Question—Why are Cercles de Fermieres so called and what is the difference between them and Women's Institutes?

Answer—Circles or Unions of Farm Women—to translate freely—seem to most of us to be an admirably descriptive title. There is no difference between them and Women's Institutes in aims and objects and methods of work but there are differences of a minor sort in administration and workings. The Cercles are so called in Belgium, in Quebec and in France.

"Well you tell yours first."

Mary told him about her father's letter.

"And now for my news. Mr. Gifford has started a new business in Toronto which needs all his attention, and he has offered me the managership of the mill at three hundred a month, and I have accepted it."

A click of the gate made them turn and look. There was a fine-looking, white-haired man coming up the path. "Father, Father, is it really you!" cried Mary as she ran into his arms.

That evening Aunt Martha joined a very happy group under the dogwood tree. They all sat talking long after dark—talking, yes, but often just silently feasting on the joy of reunion. Frankie climbed into his grandfather's lap and went to sleep, and Mary carried him in to bed.

"Well, Martha, is there room for me in your bungalow?"

"Oh not to-night, father, stay with us to-night," cried Frank and Mary together.

"All right, children, I will stay."

attractive with as little labor as possible. Everything used as a garnish should be edible. A bed of crisp lettuce leaves is the most attractive setting for any salad. Cress or a nest of shredded lettuce, also makes an attractive border. Celery tops, cut radishes, pimento strips, ribbons of green pepper, sections of hard boiled eggs, nuts, olives, candied grapefruit or orange peel may also be used to make a salad appetizing. The colors in the salad itself and the firmness of the fruits or vegetables used, constitute an important factor in securing attractiveness. One must have "salad sense" to know what materials agree in flavor as well as color to originate combinations.

The dressings for salads may be divided into four classes—French dressing, Mayonnaise, boiled dressing, and cream dressing. Each has its particular place and is suitable for certain kinds of salad.

A very simple, old fashioned form of dressing for plain lettuce is vinegar and sugar. Substitute lemon juice or fresh lime juice for the vinegar and you will have a very refreshing and simple salad for a summer day.

A simple French dressing easily and quickly prepared consists of three tablespoons of olive oil and one tablespoon of vinegar, seasoned with an abundance of salt and pepper or paprika and beaten to a creamy smoothness. It is not well to have the salad stand for long in the dressing, and for this reason, it is well to mix it on the table, just before serving. When this is not convenient, the dressing may be passed around or added the last thing before serving from a side table.

whipped cream or egg white when mayonnaise is to be used. Mayonnaise should be stiff enough to hold its shape when done.

Points to observe in making Mayonnaise. (1) Place the bowl on ice (2) Olive oil and eggs should be chilled, (3) Have egg yolk as free from white as possible, (4) Do not add ingredients rapidly. The dressing may curdle if the ingredients are not cold or are added rapidly without thorough blending. A curdled dressing may be corrected by placing an egg yolk in a clean bowl and adding the curdled mixture gradually, beating thoroughly and then continuing with the oil. Mayonnaise may be varied by adding one-half teaspoon each of finely chopped capers, pickles, olives and parsley just before serving.

Boiled Dressing is a very common and useful form of salad dressing. It is especially useful in garnishing vegetable salads and is sometimes preferred in any salad by persons to whom oil is distasteful. The butter of boiled dressing takes the place of the oil. Two eggs, one-half teaspoon of mustard, one-half teaspoon of salt, one half-tablespoon sugar, 3 tablespoons of vinegar, one-half cup hot water, one tablespoon butter, few grains of cayenne. Mix dry ingredients and beat with the eggs until light. Add vinegar and water and cook in a double boiler, stirring constantly until thick and smooth. Remove from fire, stir in butter, and set away to cool. Whipped cream added after the dressing cools is a great addition. In a closed jar this dressing will keep for weeks.

French dressing is chiefly used for uncooked vegetables and for marinating cooked salad materials.

Grape Fruit French Dressing. Five tablespoons olive oil, two and one-half tablespoons grape fruit, three quarters teaspoon powdered sugar, one-half teaspoon salt, one quarter teaspoon paprika. Mix ingredients in order given, chill thoroughly and shake well before using.

Astoria Dressing. One-half cup olive oil, juice one-half lemon, juice one-half orange, one teaspoon grated onion, one quarter teaspoon salt, one quarter teaspoon paprika, one teaspoon Worcestershire sauce, one quarter teaspoon mustard, one tablespoon finely chopped parsley. Mayonnaise Dressing. Three egg-yolks, one tablespoon mustard, one tablespoon sugar, one teaspoon salt, one-quarter teaspoon paprika, one tablespoon mustard, one tablespoon sugar, one teaspoon salt, one-quarter teaspoon paprika, two cups olive oil, one-quarter cup vinegar, one and one-half tablespoons lemon juice, one-half cup whipped cream or white of one egg. Mix dry ingredients, add to beaten egg yolks. Add oil, drop by drop, and beat constantly. After one-quarter cup of oil has been added it can be added in larger proportions. When it comes thick thin with a little vinegar. Then alternate with vinegar and oil until all is used. Add lemon juice last. Fold in

A variation of boiled dressing is Thousand Island Dressing. To one cup boiled dressing add one tablespoon each of minced onion, green pepper and pimento, a hard boiled egg chopped fine, paprika and salt to taste, or you may add to one cup of dressing three tablespoons of home-made chili sauce.

Cream Dressings are especially good for fruit salads. They are particularly easy to make and an excellent way to utilize sour cream. Mix one and one-half tablespoons sugar, one teaspoon salt and a few grains cayenne with one tablespoon lemon juice. Add to one cup of cream (sweet or sour) stiffly beaten. Lastly add one tablespoon of vinegar.

Summer Salads. The following recipes are designed for warm weather menus. They are summer salads. Some of them will be most suitably served during the dinner, other may constitute the main dish for luncheon or supper as they are nourishing as well as appetizing, and still others with crackers and a bit of cheese may serve as a dessert.

Watermelon Salad. Cut balls of the melon with a scoop cutter or cut one and one-half inch cubes and place on hearts of lettuce with French dressing. The coloring of the melon makes an attractive table decoration.

Prune Salad. Mix together one cup of chopped prunes, one cup almonds, one cup marshmallow. Serve on lettuce leaf with cream dressing.

JUNIPER JUNCTION

BY BERTHA E. GREEN

THE wide-awake sun of a May morning was fast drinking the dew that lay on each leaf of the almost treeless ridge. There were bushes, some of them wild brier with freshly opened blossoms, that had found a foothold in the shallow soil in the rock crevices. Lichens and mosses spread in gray, green, and brown patches here and there, as if they sought to cover the bareness of the rocky ridge.

At the peak of this rock-tumbled hillock grew what seemed to be a stunted tree, for, instead of a straight trunk with shading branches, this evergreen held its branches low, stretching them out crookedly, hugging the rocks as if afraid. Two of the branches were far longer than the others, one pointing to the North and the pines, the other toward the East and a little lake. This was Juniper Junction.

A tiny speck of red shot through the sunlight, coming to rest at the fork of the two long limbs of the Juniper.

"I really don't know why I came, but I'm here anyway," said the tiny, red speck, whom one might now have seen to be the Ladybird, that pretty, little, scarlet beetle with a single black dot on each wing.

The raven looked very wise as he said: "When'er you whistle, you will find, If you that whistle bear in mind, Sooner or late will come a breeze To sing or whisper 'mongst the trees!" "You don't say so!" exclaimed the Ladybird.

"Yes, I said so," retorted Blackie Longbill rather gruffly; then, in a more polite tone, he remarked "I suppose you came over to see the procession. I may as well tell you there isn't going to be any."

"What procession do you mean?" inquired the Ladybird.

"The grand march of the caterpillars," was the reply. "Everybody expected them to start to-day, but not one of them hatched out in time. Too bad, wasn't it?"

"I should say so!" exclaimed the Ladybird. "I suppose that you came a long way to watch the procession."

"Oh, no," laughed Blackie Longbill, "my nest is almost within sight of here. I didn't come to watch any procession, but to find out who was whistling."

"And now that you have found out, what are you going to do?" asked the Ladybird.

"I am the Black Rove Beetle," was the reply. "Just now, I'm a teacher of manners."

"What shall I do?" she continued "Shall I go to the lake, or to the pines? I'll whistle while I think about it."

It was a faint, high whistle, as if the Ladybird did not wish anyone to hear it, but someone had good ears, for a harsh voice said:

"Do you think that will bring it?" The Ladybird looked around quickly, and saw a coal-black raven perching on one of the long branches of juniper.

"I'm Blackie Longbill," said the raven. "I did the talking, and, if you don't remember what I said, it was this - Do you think that will bring it?"

"Do I think what will bring what?" asked the Ladybird.

"That, is the whistle and it, is the wind," replied the blackbird. "You're whistling for wind, aren't you?"

"I never thought about it for a moment," laughed the Ladybird, "I don't believe such a thing anyway."

"That shows all you know about it," said the raven, shaking his head "why, I whistle sometimes myself."

"And does your whistle bring the wind?" asked the Ladybird.

"Wait until somebody else whistles," answered the raven.

There was a sharp, whistly snort from the other side of the Juniper, and both the raven and the Ladybird jumped.

"You didn't have to wait long for another whistle. Did you Blackie Longbill?" said some one from behind the Juniper.

"What are you hiding for?" asked the raven angrily. "Why don't you show yourself?"

"Who is it?" asked the Ladybird in a low voice.

"O, that old grunter, Grimmer the woodchuck," replied the raven. "I'm sure I never asked him to come here."

There was a grunt from behind the Juniper, and the woodchuck spoke again: "I wouldn't bother asking you whether I could come or not, Blackie Longbill."

The raven ruffled up his feathers at this, and the woodchuck walked slowly around in front of the Ladybird. He was a rough-coated fellow, was Grimmer the woodchuck, with stubby nose, stubby the bank of the river towards his house. He held her hand in his, leading her, directing her in the darkness. When she faltered, he put his arm about her. She rested on his strength. The mystery of the woods enclosed her. Cool leaves touched her. Branches would have held her. She was not afraid. She saw the ranked trees of the young orchard, the wild apple tree like a cloud against the stars, before it seemed possible. She said dreamily, "Are we back already?" In a minute he told her, "You have been walking two hours."

HE LED her up a long path between rows of apple saplings which would one day be great and fruitful; he opened the door of his house, went in, and lighted a lamp. The place sprang to her sight in a cordial glow; walls of red cedar, shelves, books, rugs. She entered after him. He pointed to an inner door.

"My sister's room," he said. "You'll find everything there. Towels, blankets, clothes. And a lamp. Here are matches. While you change, I'll get into some dry things, light the stove, and when you're ready, we'll have something to eat."

Anna said doubtfully, "Your sister—she won't mind if I use her things?"

He looked at her with his strange still eyes. He said, "My sister died last year. I keep her things ready for her just the same. I like to. I thought—perhaps she liked it too."

Anna bent her head. She went softly into the inner room, looking back at him with eyes grave and clear as a child's, and shut the door.

He had the stove lighted and food prepared when she came out, wearing clothes too large for her, and carrying her own wet ones, which she dropped by the stove. He said, "I'm afraid they're spoiled."

"It doesn't matter," answered Anna vaguely, "they're not my clothes."

She meant that they were Mrs. Aymery's clothes. Mrs. Aymery had clothed her and housed her for three years that she might make a good match at the end. And Cavan was the match. Suddenly, Anna laughed aloud, stirring the wet garments with her foot.

Woodin made her eat and drink. She obeyed him, smiling like a child through a drowsiness so deep it was like a mist, now of foam, now of blown apple-petals. He talked to her sometimes, sometimes was silent, watching her. Soon he said, "Now go and sleep."

Again she went softly to the inner room. "Good-night," she said. But he did not reply. He was looking from the window at his baby-orchard, dark under the stars, as if he thought the little trees must suddenly have bloomed.

Anna lay down on the dead girl's cot and sank at once into a fathomless security of sleep.

When she awoke it was morning. Birds sang. In youngest sunlight the woods spread beyond the orchard like a sea. From the window she stretched her hands to them. "Lovely," she said, "lovely!"

She came out to Woodin, wearing his sister's clothes. He had made a fire in the stove and prepared breakfast. He asked her, "You slept well?" She told him, "All night long." Her face confirmed it, and the morning in her eyes. They sat down and ate together. The shadows shortened on the cedar floor.

Later, he told her, "It's time to go." She stood up, ready to follow him through the woods, back to Milbrook. She glanced about the room slowly. He said, "You'll see this place again."

When they went out, the hour's promise lay on the orchard. Each twig was tipped with the green flame of spring. But half-way down the long path, Anna stopped. She said to Woodin, "Look." Raising a little apple-bough, she showed him the flower buds, the first, nested in the living green and ready to unfold.

seated at small tables before fantastically eastern Cafe de Paris. Pigeons whirled and strutted, or sat on the hands of the Casino clock. It was like a scene in a wonderfully staged play; and none of the many characters assembled knew that the hero and heroine of the piece had just come on. But we knew it. We knew it well, and I thrilled all over as Patchinka pressed my arm.

Just for an instant I'd forgotten that I had to double the part of watching with that of leading man. I had gazed up at the aeroplane—dead Sacha's Mascot—and glanced down at the rapt face of Sacha's sister, small and pale. But I quickly remembered, not too late; and there was the brown overcoat with the astrakhan collar, so near that it seemed as if the electric current of our thoughts must strike it as it stood, and make it wince.

If I'd needed proof that Patchinka had identified the man, I had it then. This man's interest in the finely displayed prize was no chance interest, like that of many others who paused, gazed, admired, and passed on. He was absorbed, and thought of nothing else—not even of himself.

There was a light barrier round the machine, to prevent idle or mischievous hands touching the wings, or the singularly long, swallow-like tail. There were also several good-natured and rather bored gens d'armes guarding the bright, particular star of the Place; but Senor Mendez of Barcelona edged as close as he dared. Nor did he stop in one place. Having looked his fill at one of the wings he strolled slowly to a position where he could examine the tail, and from there he passed on to feast his vision upon another wing.

Whatever he did, we did also, though keeping at a discreet distance not to attract attention, and talking in low voices.

"Is it quite understood?" Patchinka asked at last. "You will go after him when he goes, and you will know where to find us again, when you are sure where he will stay?"

"Yes," I assured her. "You and Miss Wellington will do what you proposed; take a table in front of the Cafe and order tea. But mind, we mustn't have any blunders! No matter how long I have to be gone, you will stay in one spot and wait."

"It is a promise," she said.

Almost as she spoke, Mendez decided to tear himself away from the object of his interest.

He had a small bag in his right hand, shifting it to the left, he turned his back on the biplane. Then he began walking up the palm-shaded Public Gardens that stretch away from the Place du Casino straight to the street of the trams and shops. The man had a purposeful air, and I told myself that, despite the crowded state of the hotels he had secured himself a perch of some sort in advance. I hoped that there might be a garret or a cellar in it for me, for this affair had settled the matter of my residence. It wasn't to be Cap Martin. It wasn't to be Nice. It was to be Monte Carlo, if I slept upon a seat on the Casino terrace!

CHAPTER XV.

A Girl On A Balcony.

AT the top of the Gardens Mendez turned to the right and walked with a decided step along the street of shops and trams, the Boulevard des Moulins. On, on he went, I trailing him at a safe distance, glad that he never glanced back.

Presently the Boulevard des Moulins renamed itself Boulevard d'Italie. The shops were fewer and less smart. Huge box-like buildings composed of flats dominated the side of the street which had the view of the sea. What should I do, I asked myself, if Mendez went into a private apartment house, instead of an hotel? My calculations would be disastrously thrown out.

To my relief, however, just as the situation was getting on my nerves the man stopped and pushed open the glass door of a bar. "British Bar" I read in gilded letters on the glass; and in connection, I rejoiced to see, was "British Hotel."

A balcony ran across the front of the white-washed, cheap-looking but not unattractive building, and on this balcony sat a young woman in a deck chair. My attention was so firmly pinned to Mendez' back, that I might not have noticed her, if the girl hadn't jumped to her feet, and leaned well over the railing, just above my head. Evidently small incidents such as the arrival of new comers to the hotel were of keen interest to her. An involuntary upward flash, in which my eyes met a light blue gaze, showed me a face round and pallid as the moon, framed in straw-coloured hair and shaded with a big, flower-laden hat. Just the sort of face that would want to know everything that happened in the street, and concerning everybody who went in, or came out of, its hotels. Just the sort of face to see once was to forget twice; and I promptly forgot it as I followed Mendez into the bar.

The very fact that the house was called "British Hotel" made me sure that, whatever else it might be, British it was not; and this assumption was justified by the presence of two unmistakable Italians behind the bar; a stout elderly man and a slim young one. Except in their age and their figures, the pair resembled each other; the proprietor and his son, I deduced. They greeted Mendez in French, as a language common to the three; and I was able to pick up, in a few words, a certain amount of free information. Mendez was known by name to the Signori Bagnoni. He had stopped at the British Hotel some years before, being remembered there, it seemed, by a big win he had made at the Casino. He had now engaged his room in advance, and wished the landlord to think that he had come to try his luck again at the Rooms. No mention was made of the forthcoming lottery, nor the prizes.

I was allowed to wait during the few minutes' chat, no attention being paid to me—save a polite bow—until the younger Bagnoni, addressed as "Paul" by Mendez, had begun to mix a cocktail for the thirsty traveller. Then the fat landlord turned to me, with a questioning "Monsieur?"

I ordered a glass of Monaco beer, and asked in my lame French if I could have a room.

The drink was promptly given, foaming and cold. But as for the room, the Italian proprietor of the British Hotel regretted that he had not one at his disposal. Indeed, he feared that there was not much chance of my getting one anywhere at Monte Carlo. The place was full. The whole Riviera was crammed. There were so many attractions this season, among others the great lottery of which no doubt Monsieur had heard?

At this question Mendez' bright black eyes flashed to me, with his first show of interest. He wished to know how that question would be answered; but I gave a languid reply, and persisted in my request for a room. Anything would do for me. Wasn't there a box-room where I could be put up?

"I fear there is nothing at all Monsieur," said Bagnoni senior, with the polite indifference of a landlord whose pockets are full as well as his house. But as he spoke his eyes suddenly fixed themselves on something behind me. Mechanically I turned, and saw that the girl with the flowery hat and straw-coloured hair hovered in a doorway between the bar and the hotel restaurant. With her was a buxom looking, richly-tinted woman of fifty or so, with Irish eyes and a long upper lip. The latter lady wore

More Cake Questions!

OF the hundreds of queries on every phase of baking received in this department daily, the majority emphasize "cake troubles". Space does not permit our answering all questions on these pages, so only a few of the commonest difficulties follow:

Question: How can I cream shortening easily and quickly?

Answer: When getting ready to make a cake and before measuring materials, pour a little boiling water into the mixing bowl. Let stand until ready to begin cake, then rinse and dry out bowl before measuring the butter or other shortening. This will soften it without melting it too much.

Question: Can sour milk be used with baking powder with good results?

Answer: Yes, if just sufficient soda is used to neutralize the acid of the sour milk and then the usual amount of baking powder added for leavening purposes; for example, a recipe calling for one cup of milk, two teaspoons baking powder, use one cup sour milk, one-third teaspoon soda, and two teaspoons Royal Baking Powder, sifting the soda and baking powder in with the flour as usual. Buttermilk can also be used in same manner as sour milk.

Now that the warm weather is approaching, many women, and especially those in the country, will undoubtedly have sour milk on hand. Do not hesitate to make cakes and other baking powder foods because you have only sour milk, for when properly used it will give you excellent results. Many sour milk recipes are unsatisfactory because too much soda or a poor grade of baking powder has been used. One-third of a teaspoon of soda to a cup of thick sour milk, plus the standard amount of Royal Baking Powder for the flour called for, will give you as good results as if sweet milk were used. While the question of sour milk is taken up here in connection with cakes, it applies equally well to biscuits, muffins, and other breads.

Question: My cakes rise beautifully and after removal from the oven fall in the center. Can you tell me the trouble?

Answer: You have probably used too much sugar and shortening in proportion to the flour and baking powder, or else you have taken the cake from the oven before thoroughly baked. Use level measurements for all materials and follow carefully recipes on these pages.

JOY

By MARJORIE SUTHERLAND

I THINK I could turn and live with animals, they are so placid and self-contained;

I stand and look at them long and long. They do not sweat and whine about their condition;

They do not lie awake in the dark and weep for their sins;

They do not make me sick discussing their duty to God;

Not one is dissatisfied—not one is demented with the mania of owning things;

Not one kneels to another, nor to his kind that lived thousands of years ago;

Not one is respectable or industrious over the whole earth.

WHITMAN'S unfenced lines seem refreshing in this day of insomnia and much pulling in all strata of society in order to extract some species of "problem." We may gloat over the racy half-truth of Whitman's observations and try to make ourselves believe that it would bring us joy to be a pig without any troubles. But to be a beast without troubles is not perhaps the realization of joy, at least no beast has ever revealed to us its beatific state. Even the little vivid flashes of joy which come like lightning to the painfulest lives, even these, it seems to me, are worth the other sorrows of being human. And this reminds me of a moment of joy which I, in a sort of second-hand fashion, once saw in the life of another. I did not know the person, had never seen her before, nor have I seen her since, and yet I know that however dull or painful or stormy life has been to her—once at least she knew a moment of perfect joy.

It happened in a railway station in a busy unpoetic Western town, on a clear day of July that I saw a girl waiting for someone. I have seen many women who were more beautiful, indeed there were handsomer ones in that very station, only this one seemed to be glorified with the radiance of a great expectation, and instinctively I knew that she was waiting for her lover. She was slender and tall, dressed simply in a lavender gown with long white gloves and a white hat. The clothes were perfectly ordinary, except that they almost glowed with tiptoe anticipation of bliss. When she came into the waiting-room she looked immediately at the clock, then she removed the glove from her right hand, tucked it in carefully at the wrist, and sat down. A train boomed into the station, and instantly the girl sprang up, then looked at her clock again and sat down. It was not her train. She smoothed out her dress prettily just as if she were a little girl who had been warned against wrinkles and dust. But she was not a little girl. There was a prophetic consciousness of womanhood in her manner. All the blood of her grandmothers who had waited sometime beside a brook, under a lilac-tree or beside the church door for their mates—all the tingling expectant blood of dead women who had once been happy, glowed in the girl's cheeks as she waited.

And then a second train arrived, but of course eagerness had brought her there much too early. She was youthfully impatient and yet if only she could have realized how sweet it was to wait! The hungry wistful suspense that precedes realization—perhaps this is compensation for the pangs of disillusionment. To believe—just once—that something will be perfect, surely this exquisite faith is worth the price of imperfect reality. In years to come when the girl's bright brown hair had faded and when the wonderful passion-light in her eyes had died, perhaps she would remember this moment when she had been perfectly happy, when faith and youth conspired to elevate her to an ecstasy which reality might never fulfill—once in my girlhood, on the sixth of July, when my blood ran warm and when desire was a slow great flame within me—once I knew a moment of perfect joy, once before anything happened, before anything was real, like a vision of heaven, like a dream of peace—once, ah, once!

And then the third train came in. She walked quickly to the door and looked down the long line of dusty coaches. She was utterly oblivious to the activities of her fellow men. As far as her interest in them was concerned they lived on another planet or they were quite dead and buried. It was just as if she were alone by a brook or under a lilac-tree as her grandmothers had been—she was so perfectly sure of her moment. Detectives and undertakers and sweating burden-bearers were meeting that train also, but it was nothing to her. Why should it be? Life doesn't give us many moments like this. The sunshine of that too brilliant summer day intensified the splendor of the girl's eyes. Her hands were clenched tightly—the pink ungloved right that would soon clasp its mate. Underneath her modestly sweet gown one could see the rapid rise and fall of her young breast. A wonderful sight for her lover. Ah, it was his moment too, only men cannot give themselves, all of themselves like that.

The moment of joy was over, gone like a snuffed flame. Before this lonely pair stretched the world of reality and they were to make of it what they could there should be comfortable lounging chairs, whether of wood, willow or wicker-ware, and a table of practical size for reading-material and flowers. On the larger porch, a couch-hammock might well have a place. A tea-table, too, is an appropriate adjunct or even a larger table, in order that occasional meals may be enjoyed in the open air. If the porch has sufficient area, a desk and a magazine-stand will be found both useful and ornamental—and sets of porch furniture that include these furnishings may now be found in the shops. In wicker, they are particularly charming and Summer-looking. Bird-cages of wicker, mounted upon tall standards, are also suited to porch use.

Porch-boxes aglow with nodding flowers, hanging-baskets filled with ferns, wicker or painted tin wall-pockets brimming over with seasonable blooms: these all have a place in an outdoor living room. And, while flowers are under consideration, it is interesting to note that fickle. Fashion has restored to favor the bent-wire flower-stands of Mid-Victorian days. For porch use, they are especially attractive when filled with gaily-painted pots of trailing English ivy or feathery ferns.

Many of the little accessories of the complete porch are painted this season. Sweetmeat-boxes of tin, painted in the brightest of colors, painted tin book-ends and flower-holders, decorative watering-cans and wrought-iron aquarium-stands vie with one another in gaiety. It is, indeed, a season of joyful color—and the contagion has spread even to glass: for glass vases, candy-jars, and other small accessories suited to the porch, fairly glow with color that is frequently also iridescent.

The decoration of the porch is really a fascinating thing to-day, so lavish is the array of beautiful and utilitarian furnishings that awaits our careful choice and proper placement. Nor need we in our choosing be restrained by thoughts of cost: for, in furniture, fabrics and fittings alike, thoroughly satisfying selections can be made for a very modest outlay. Then, too, the present popularity of painted furniture and accessories materially reduces the cost of an attractive porch—or can do so, if the painting be done in the home by amateur hands.

Of whatever type your porch may be, it is—if only in embryo—an outdoor living room that can readily be developed during these days of Spring into a thing of joyful color, daily-diversified charm and Summer-long enjoyment.

The Blossoming.

"The first blossom," he said in a low voice, "and yours."

His hand went out to break the spray for her, but she put it aside. "No," she said, "leave them. Let them bear you fruit."

They went into the woods together. They were silent. It seemed to Anna that the trees and the grass spoke for her, said all in their silence that she could have said in words. She touched the trees as if she loved them; she left a blessing on the keen grass.

It was nearly noon when they stood on the edge of the road she had crossed, only the day before. The roof of the small freight-shed showed through the trees. Woodin said, "You're safe now."

She lifted her eyes to his. "I'm always safe now."

"The train will be signalled in a little while."

"Then I must go."

"But you'll come back." He smiled at her.

"Yes," assented Anna gently, "I'll come back."

"When my trees blossom," repeated Woodin with assurance, "you'll come back and marry me."

"If you'll have me," answered Anna Aymery, "I'll come back and marry you next spring."

"Then hadn't you better tell me your name and address?"

They laughed helplessly, like children. She felt in her pocket and found a folded telegram. Woodin found a pencil. She scored the written message through—the "Yes," to Cavan,—and on the back of the form she wrote her name and address and gave it to Woodin. They were grave now. The wonder of the promised thing stilled them, as the woods are stilled between night and day.

Then, with his hands on her shoulders, he drew her towards him. "I love you," he said.

"I—love—you....." Her words were the tenderest echo of his own.

"This," he said, "for remembrance." He drew her nearer and kissed her trembling lips. Then he pushed her gently away, and she knew, for that time, it was farewell.

She walked quickly up the road to the railway. She was crying a little. "He's poor, I suppose," she said to herself, "that's why he can't do with me yet. And goodness knows I'm poor. I'm even wearing his sister's clothes. I hope she wouldn't mind. I wonder what she was like." She lifted her arm and lightly kissed the other girl's sleeve. "I'll be good to him, my dear," she whispered, "I'll be good to him. And he'll write and explain things. There'll be plenty of explaining to do. I'll have to explain to Philip Cavan; but I don't think he'll mind very much. And to Cousin Julia. I—I'll have to find some work. I can't wear her clothes after wearing yours. But then—it's only to wait until the trees blossom....."

Far in the distance a train whistled. She began to run, still weeping softly. As she ran she held one hand closed to her bosom; closed on a handful of petals from a wild apple tree. They rained behind her like snow.

These also were for remembrance.

A dismal old lady was depressing her long-suffering husband with a monologue on his funeral, and her own epitaph. "Hang it all, missus," he expostulated, as she meandered on about the length of their married life, and came to a hitch at the word "survive." "How do you know you will survive?"

"I have survived," she answered coldly.

"Yes, I Must Have One, Too!"

"—and you say I can get it in Early English, Golden Oak or Mahogany Finish, to match my furniture?"

no hat, was knitting a red stocking, and had the air of a superior cook.

"Mademoiselle wants to tell you, Enrico," she said hurriedly in English, "that rather than turn anyone away, with Monte Carlo crowded as it is, she'll give up her private sitting-room, and we can make it into a bedroom for this gentleman."

This doubtless was Signora Bagnoni, and the "British" element in the hotel was supplied by her. But it was to "Mademoiselle" that my thanks were due. I smiled and bowed in her direction—a smile and bow mingling gratitude and respect as thoroughly as Paulo mixed a cocktail.

"I am infinitely obliged," I addressed her in French. "But is it not inconvenient Mademoiselle too much?"

"Not a bit!" she replied with a broad, thin-lipped grin which reminded me of some other grin that seemed to be a recent though illusive memory. "You can speak English to me. I'm American. That is, I'm half American and half Dutch, and I guess you're British. I thought you were, as I saw you come in. I like English-men-people; and I knew there wasn't a room free in the house, so I just popped down to tell Mrs. Bagnoni what I was willing to do, in case you were after a room and not a—drink."

Half American—Half Dutch! Now I knew whose grin the girl's was like; the grin of Henry S. Horden, who had married a Dutch wife. He'd said that we might meet his daughter on the Riviera. But surely this couldn't be Miss Horden? The daughter of a millionaire would be at a millionaire's hotel, not at this small, third-rate place. Anyhow, for the sake of Miss P. Smith and of the Great Scheme, it would be unwise to show any knowledge of Henry S. Horden, especially at this juncture and in the presence of Mendez. Judging by the young lady's smile, she'd not be slow in giving personal details and extracting them in return. Judging also by her eyes, she was rather of a coming on disposition, I told myself; then reproached my lack of gratitude.

"Thanks most awfully!" I stumbled, consciously red with suppressed excitement. "You're sure you don't mind?"

"Sure," said she, with a strong accent of what Americans call the Middle West. "It'll be nice for me having someone young and English in this hotel. Mr. and Mrs. Bagnoni won't be cross if I say so before their faces, it isn't my kind of a hotel. It's very nice in its way, of course, only it's not a smart way, and I'm used to smart hotels everywhere. I was at the Paris here, but I made a fool of myself and lost pretty well every cent I had. Mother didn't want me to be at Monte alone, but she wouldn't come, and I was bored stiff at the Hague. I knew she wouldn't help me out at Monte, and I wasn't sure my Dad would, even if I knew his present address where I could reach him with a cable—because he doesn't approve of women gambling. Rather than explain and ask favours, I just sold some jewellery—or rather, got Mrs. Bagnoni to do it—I was recommended to her for that. And she's all right you may as well know in case you have bad luck! Then I came to this tame place and made myself comfortable, to wait till time for my next cheque. I wonder if you ever heard of my father? I guess you must have: Henry S. Horden, the automobile man."

So the grin was true to type! I wondered whether knocking up against the girl was a good accident or a bad one. Anyhow, it had happened, and couldn't unhappen. I must be wise as a serpent, and harmless as a dove!

"Yes, indeed, I've heard of Henry S. Horden," I admitted, under the black glitter of Mendez' eyes which looked quite ill with eager intelligence. "Almost everybody almost everywhere must have heard of him" (This was to prevent the young lass from saying, later, if worst came to worst, that I'd deliberately deceived her). "I think it's absolutely top hole of you to give up your sitting room—"

The girl laughed, her wide, thin-lipped mouth showing what seemed like abnormal quantities of perfect teeth. "Say that just describes it!" she giggled. "It is a 'top-hole.' But I expect Mrs. Bagnoni will make you fairly comfortable. She's a real good sort, and it's kind of fun picnicking here. It will be more fun, now you've come. I bet you've been a soldier, haven't you?"

"Of course," I replied. "In France and Russia. It was tanks in Russia. My name's Christopher Malet."

"What a nice name! Are you Mister, or Captain or what?"

"Captain. I'm having—er—a sort of rest and look round. I don't know what I should have done if it hadn't been for you."

"Well, I shouldn't be surprised if I'd get back more than I've given," said Miss Horden, good-naturedly. "I told you I liked English men—people, and I expect we'll be pals before long."

"I hope so, if you'll allow me," I responded, perhaps rather stiffly. But you see, I was thinking about Patchinka and the Iron Duke and the bulldog; and I couldn't be sure, all on the spur of the moment, how a palship with Miss Horden would work in with my other duties and privileges. The girl (I remembered that her father had called her "Wendela") had a good-natured face as well as a good-natured voice. A round moon-face does give an impression of good-nature, just as the moon does, when serenely full. Still, her lips were thin,—much thinner than Henry S. Horden's, whose large mouth hers somewhat resembled; and one has heard that hardness dwells behind the pale windows of unusually light blue eyes. Putting this and that together, something within me shrank into itself, as a hermit-crab tucks legs and tail into his borrowed shell at the faintest hint of unseen disturbance in his neighborhood.

"I suppose you're alone at Monte Carlo, as I am?" Miss Horden went on. "At least, I did have a maid. But I shed her."

"I am —er—sort of looking after two ladies I travelled with," I explained. "And their dog."

"Sounds dull," laughed the girl. "But perhaps you'll shed them, now you've arrived at Monte—as I did my maid."

"I hardly think I can shed them," I said solemnly. "And that reminds me, I promised, when I settled myself at an hotel, to join them."

"How awful!" Miss Horden pitied me. "They're sure to be old maids—travelling with a dog."

"One is," I admitted. "Well, I must sign my name in the book—and thank you again—and be going."

"Poor you!" sighed the girl. "You'll be here to dinner?"

"I—think so."

"Yes, do. You can sit at my table. Oh, don't thank me! I'd like to have you. We might say seven fifteen. And if you want me to, I'll take you to the Casino later. Is that an engagement?"

Desperate to escape and get back to Patchinka, I said that it was and mumbled a few politenesses. Before I could tear myself away, however, Mendez had gone out, leaving his bag to be carried to his bedroom. He had vanished in the distance before I had shot into the street, but judging him to a certain extent by myself, I was convinced that he would be drawn to the Place du Casino by the lure of Sacha Kapieha's biplane.

Taking the Scissors From Baby

Patsy, and finally a truce, with the latter dictating the terms of surrender.

The day wore on, Will's name tabooed by both women. At night Patsy went to the opera with the trio of the previous evening. Shortly after they had left the house Aunt Jool was summoned from the attic by the peremptory ring of the door-bell. It was a boy with a wheel. "Telegram for Miss Pennock," he announced briskly. The startled woman tore open the yellow envelope, then remembered that she had left her glasses in the attic.

"You read it for me, will you Sonny?" she asked of the lad, who was waiting for a possible answer.

He complied, willingly. "It's dated New York," he informed her. Then he read it all in one breath.

"Just arrived sorry not time say good-bye, home, Friday, if possible, love, Will."

Aunt Jool gazed blankly at the boy, then told him there would be no answer and watched him run lightly down the steps. She toiled back to the attic, found her glasses and sat down to read this strange message for herself.

In the first place she discovered that it was not intended for her at all, but for Patsy. Secondly, it explained Will's sudden breaking of his appointment, for that was the night that he had been called away to New York. In the third place it meant at least two days more of silence from Will—if Patsy did not see that telegram.

That Patsy should not see it Aunt Jool was determined. She was a general, now, planning a campaign against the stubborn, wilful young heart of her niece.

In the wisdom of her love for the girl, Aunt Jool knew that this seeming silence on the part of her lover would be strategy far more effective than any amount of pleading or argument. Therefore, when Patsy came home that night, the telegram was companioning a letter that for several days had been enduring a dark and damp existence beneath the back stoop.

THURSDAY came and with it reaction for Patsy. She was moody and silent, starting nervously every time a bell rang, watching furtively for the postman. Aunt Jool observed and pronounced it good.

After supper, Patsy came to the door of the kitchen where her aunt was preparing grapefruit for the morning meal.

"Aunt Jool," she said, tentatively, "do you suppose this—er—estrangement will go very hard with Will?"

Aunt Jool looked up in surprise. "Certainly," she answered bluntly. "What did you expect?"

Patsy colored. "Of course," she defended, "I wanted him to understand that it was all over between us, but I wouldn't like to think that I had been the cause of his doing anything rash."

Aunt Jool suppressed a smile. "I wouldn't concern myself about that," she said, complacently. "Will's far too sensible and level-headed to do anything idiotic. Of course," she temporized, as she wiped a bit of juice from her eye, "I've no doubt it's been a hard blow for him, poor fellow, but the fact that you haven't heard from him would lead one to suppose that he had taken you seriously at last."

Patsy stood tense and motionless as Aunt Jool sugared the fruit and put it in the ice-box. Gunga Din appeared from a mysterious somewhere, was fed and put down cellar, and still Patsy stood.

"I wouldn't let it worry me too much, girlie," said her aunt, at length. "Time heals all wounds, you know. Besides, Will is a very personable young man; there will be plenty of others to help him to forget."

Others? The shaft flew straight to its mark. Patsy's face went white, and murmuring something about being tired she went slowly up to her room.

That night on retiring Aunt Jool stopped at the girl's door. All was quiet and she stole softly in and pulled the chain of the little white boudoir-lamp. Patsy, flushed and tear-stained, had thrown both slender arms above her head, and one hand clasped tightly—Will's photograph!

Aunt Jool bent over and kissed the sleeping girl. Tenderly she lifted down the bare white arms and drew the coverlet. Patsy stirred slightly and Aunt Jool put out the light and waited in silence until the breathing became regular once more. Then she stole quietly out again.

The day that followed was even more depressing than the previous one. Patsy was now openly wretched. A dozen times Aunt Jool was tempted to reveal the comforting truth, then decided to let things take their course.

Towards evening a cold, drizzly rain set in, and after supper the two sat in silence by the old-fashioned kitchen range, Aunt Jool knitting. Patsy teasing Gunga Din and finding momentary diversion in his tiny wrath. Presently she put him down and went to the phone, reappearing a moment later, her face white with misery.

"He's gone, Aunt Jool," she said, despairingly, as she sank into a chair. "Will's gone. I've just called up his boarding-place and they say he went away Monday night and they don't know where he is or when he'll be back."

The utter hopelessness in her voice broke the listening woman's heart. "It's all right, darling," she cried, "I should have told you—"

Patsy did not hear her. The telephone had rung.

In a few minutes dancing footsteps brought her back to the kitchen. "It was Will," she exclaimed, joyfully. "He's just back from New York—been away on business. He'll be over in twenty minutes." She gave her aunt an ecstatic hug then picked up Gunga Din and made him execute a fox-trot on the table.

Suddenly she let him go. "Auntie," she said, thoughtfully, "I told Will to— to disregard that letter of mine and he didn't know what I was talking about; said there was no letter at the house from me. What do you suppose could have happened it?"

Aunt Jool bent carefully over a dropped stitch. "Don't you think you had better light a fire in the sitting-room?" she countered. Patsy hurried away.

Half an hour later her sweet treble drifted out to the kitchen. "Aunt Jool, Will says he sent a telegram from New York. It was never delivered here, was it?"

Aunt Jool's heart sank. The time to confess had come—and confession seemed harder than she had imagined. Would they be angry—think her an interfering old fool?

Resolutely she laid down her knitting and entered the sitting-room. "Children," she began bravely, "I—I'm afraid I've been meddling—" Then she stopped and moved back into the shadow. She had not even been noticed. Within the protecting circle of Will's arm, Patsy was holding up a small white hand for inspection. On her slender third finger gleamed something that had not been there before; something that flashed and glittered splendidly in the firelight's fitful glow.

Aunt Jool tiptoed out to the kitchen. Quietly she opened the back door and guided by the light from the window made her way down the dripping steps. Gingerly, for it was very dark and creepy in there, she reached a hand under the veranda and drew forth two small, damp objects.

Back in the kitchen she raised the lid of the stove and dropped them in. They hissed faintly as they struck the glowing coals, then burst into flame and curled into black, fantastic shapes. With a sigh of relief Aunt Jool replaced the lid and took up the little red sweater.

The new guard was not familiar with a certain railway run in Wales. Came a station which rejoiced in the name of Llanfairfechanpwllgogerych. For a few minutes he stood looking at the sign-board in mute helplessness. Then pointing to the board, and waving his other arm toward the carriages, he called. "If there's anybody there for here, this is it!"

New Gifts for Old

"We could, if you will choose cheaper paper for our home in Montreal," he answered instantly and after a moment his wife agreed to his suggestion.

FOR the next few weeks, confusion reigned in the old Gibson house in Clifton. Loads of furniture went away and loads of furniture came back again, much to the mystification of the neighbors, who could not imagine what metamorphosis was taking place. Paperers and painters appeared with their ladders and pails while in a back room a seamstress sewed busily on yards and yards of chintz.

When September came and the cool breezes drove Mr. and Mrs. Gibson home again, everything in their house in Clifton was in perfect order, and their children could scarcely wait for them to see it. Rosamonde and Hugh had gone to the station to meet the train and as they came home through the quiet streets of the sober, old town, Mrs. Gibson wondered what had happened to her son and daughter. They seemed different somehow, younger, less matter of fact, while their answers to her simple questions about home were positively mysterious. All sorts of explanations for their strange demeanor swept into their mother's mind. She was just beginning to reconcile herself to the idea that the house had been burned down in her absence or that something equally calamitous had occurred when the cab stopped, and Hugh was hurrying her up the steps to the big front door, with her husband and Rosamonde following eagerly behind.

At her first glimpse of the lovely old hall, lit by the soft glow of a stair lamp. Mrs. Gibson caught her breath in amazement and behind her, her husband uttered an exclamation of surprise. Looking at the pretty furniture, the lovely walls, and the soft thick rug on the floor both parents felt as if some magic had charmed their eyes, but before they could ask any questions Helena had opened the door into the living room so that they could see the rosewood piano, and the easy chairs gay in their coverings of pretty chintz.

Then Mrs. Gibson's eyes filled with sudden tears. "Oh what is it, my dears? What is it?" she asked tremulously.

At the question Helena and Rosamonde slipped loving arms around her.

"We found out what you liked," they said together, "We were awfully stupid not to have guessed it long ago."

"But what should an old woman do with such a lovely home?" objected Mrs. Gibson when her children had told her the whole tender little story of their Summer's work. "It was too sweet of you for words, but we must not keep your things, indeed, indeed we must not."

"The girls silenced her objections with kisses. "But we WANT you to keep them," they insisted, "Just as years ago you wanted to do things for us, and, if you don't take them," Hugh intervened, "My contribution shall stay out in the back yard. I wouldn't have the face to use it again, knowing what I do."

This seemed to settle the controversy but in the background Mr. Gibson rubbed his bewildered eyes.

"Why didn't you tell me that the house meant so much to you Marcia?" he demanded, "You might have had more things all along but I never dreamed you cared. I didn't understand Dear, I didn't understand."

Then his wife looked up at him with a face which glowed with happiness.

"Men never do understand," she said dreamily, "To most of them a house is a place to eat and sleep in, nothing more, but we women are shut into them year after year. They grow to be part of us somehow, and we hate to see them shabby and neglected when we are growing old together. You mustn't worry over it, now, Will. Its been worth the years and years of waiting for beautiful things just to know that our children did this for us, and that they are willing to give us their best."

Winsome

The New Toilet Soap—actual size

Winsome in name—Winsome in deed

In announcing "Winsome" Toilet Soap to Canada's millions we do so knowing that it will make a wonderful appeal. It is the newest and most exceptional product of the Vinolia laboratories. It is the purest and finest Toilet Soap that science can devise. We cannot make Winsome Soap better—if we could we would.

WINSOME is entirely British and made in Canada. For years our investigators have been studying the Canadian climate, our varying water supplies, and the different living conditions of Canadians, as they affect the skin and complexion of our people. The problem was to make a new soap just right for Canadians—not a foreign soap adapted to Canada.

THIS problem has been wondrously well solved in "Winsome."

WITH our associations we are the largest soap makers in the world. Direct from our own plantations in the South Seas, come the very cream of soap-making oils for "Winsome." From France and the Orient comes the enticing "Winsome" blend of perfumes. Under the care of soap experts comes the "Winsome" tablet itself—exquisitely pure and snowy white. The daily use of "Winsome" is an unrivalled aid in cleansing, and purifying the complexion, and keeping the skin clear, and smooth as silk.

WE could use cheaper and inferior grades of material, and cover these up by adding colour to the soap, thereby saving many dollars in the cost per gross cakes, but the public of Canada know that Vinolia Soaps stand supreme. Our name and reputation the world over is a synonym for quality—hence the whiteness and purity of "Winsome."

ASK your druggist or at the toilet section of your stores for "Winsome." One trial will make you a "Winsome" user always.

"Winsome" is our registered name for Toilet Preparations and Perfumery.

Two Paint Facts That You Should Know

WHEN you dip a brush into the average paint and spread it on a surface, you find it takes a lot of brushing to make it cover evenly. Also, that no matter how careful you are, it still shows the brush marks, or little ridges.

Between every one of those ridges is a thin streak. Therefore, the paint film is only as strong as those thin streaks.

Now, dip your brush into a can of Lowe Brothers High Standard Paint and spread it on the surface. You will be delighted to see how thoroughly it covers. Further, it will level up and dry with a smooth surface, without any ridges or thin streaks.

Doing that, you can easily see why High Standard costs less per job. It cuts down the cost of painting. And because it forms a uniformly thick film, it lasts longer, and looks better as long as it lasts.

“The Happy Happenings” is crammed with useful, practical hints and valuable painting experience. Send ten cents for your copy.

of palms and grass touched by the brilliant lights, gave me a queer sense of unreality. Could it be true that I was in Monte Carlo, or should I wake from a Sunday afternoon doze at the Bournemouth Haven Hotel with an illustrated paper in my hand—a paper showing a big biplane in the Place du Casino?

Well, I shouldn't so much mind its being a dream if Patchinka Kapieha were in it, and I could find, instead of missing her, as one does continually miss the loved-and-sought for one in the most poignant kind of dream.

The Place was all a-glitter, and the flags and other decorations of the great lottery prize were gorgeous as poppies in July. The crowd was as thick as ever, and not a chair or table in front of the fantastically eastern Cafe de Paris was unoccupied. At first I couldn't see Patchinka's demurely toqued little head among the feathered and flowered hats, and a monkey wrench seemed to twist my heart; but as I stared vaguely about, something butted against my leg. It was the blunt nose of Petro used as he used it when shutting a door with his face.

His crooked tail wagged, and he guided me through a labyrinth of closely-set iron tables until I caught sight of a small, waving hand; the hand of Patchinka.

Petro saw you and went of his own accord to tell you where we were. I did not send him,” she said. “See, we’ve managed to keep a chair for you. What is the news?”

I told her, and she listened with the shadow of a frown to the story of Miss Horden and her kindness.

“I hardly know whether to thank our lucky stars for the young woman, or to wish her at the Dickens,” I laughed, when Patchinka continued to brood. “What do you think?”

“I think—she will be a complication,” exclaimed the girl.

“What kind of a complication?” I pressed her; but she shook her head, smiling faintly. “I can't tell just what kind, but anyhow that is for you to puzzle out, because it may concern you more than the rest of us. There is one thing we can be sure of, though. As Miss Horden is here, and mixed up with our lives we must make the best of her, and—Mendez will do that too! You remember what Mr. Horden said—that Mendez had business in Holland and had met Mrs. Horden there, long ago? Well, he has heard this girl tell you who her father is. He will pick up acquaintance with her, as they're in the same hotel, and we don't know what that may lead to.”

“Shall I wire Horden that his daughter's in a cheap hotel alone at Monte Carlo, jolly hard up?” I suggested. “He'd wire her money and she'd go back like a shot to the Paris, or some other smart hotel, out of Mendez' way and ours—perhaps be asked to leave Monte altogether.”

“It is not worth while to mix yourself up in the business with that hope,” pronounced Patchinka, with the grave wisdom of a Fate. “Miss Horden will not waste her kindness. She will not leave the little hotel, no, not if her father sends ten thousand pounds.”

“How can you be so sure of that?” I argued. “She can't be very comfy, especially now she's given up her private sitting room to me.”

“Whether she's comfortable or not, she will stay,” the girl persisted, and I had to let it go at that. After all, I told myself, Miss Wendell Horden could be nothing worse than a bore. My principal interest in her at the moment narrowed down to the question: How was I to get out of dining with her, as, in my desire for escape at any price, I'd recklessly agreed to do? But even that could be decided in future. The present was occupied utterly by Patchinka.

“Miss Horden can stay at the British Hotel all the rest of her young life for all I care!” I dismissed the subject. “The thing is, what's to become of you—and Petro and Miss Wellington, of course? It's early yet, although the sky and the whole air are turning such a wonderful purple—or is it a strange blue? There's a taxi-stand just up the Gardens. I saw it. We'll whizz over to Cap Martin in no time, and if your fair Marquesa is there—“Sacha's fair Marquesa,” the girl caught me up. “She is there. But—”

“Who told you?”

“The waiter who brought me this sirop. I talked to him. I got him to talk. I asked about several well-known people—and the Marquesa di Fiumine. Everyone knows, it seems. It is a strange story! Now I understand why she never answered my letters. Poor lady, perhaps it was grief for Sacha that turned her brain—though people who know nothing of him think it was what she went through of persecution in the war—and shame because of her suspected husband. She is living there in her beautiful villa, but she is like a prisoner, never going outside the garden gates. She has lost her mind, the waiter says. I am so sad for her, I cannot think about myself. Yet you see—as things are with her we can get no help of any kind from Sacha's love. It is useless to hope that I can stay with her at the Villa Persano, so we need not go to Cap Martin. I must live at Monte Carlo—or perhaps at Nice; though I would rather be nearer Sacha's Mascot.”

“Wait a minute. Let me think,” I said. “I'm not so sure you oughtn't to go to Cap Martin. Of course you can't visit the Marquesa if she's off her head. But a queer idea has popped into mine. Did your gossiping waiter say whether the lady's pro-Austrian husband was living with her at the Villa?”

“Oh no, the husband's not there. It seems he came back to France after the war was over, but people were so horrid to him, that he went to Italy.”

“Humph!” I grunted. “Supposing she isn't really insane after all, but only neurotic and easily brow-beaten? Suppose the husband was jealous of your brother, and wanted revenge on his wife? Or, suppose that this is a way of getting her fortune into his own hands, shutting her up, and administering her affairs—”

Patchinka opened her eyes wide and stared at me. Instead of green-grey, they looked black in the mingling twilight and electricity. “That is like the plot of a wicked novel,” she said.

I was half ashamed of my sensationalism. “I know,” I admitted. “It does sound silly. But since I began to do my soldiering in the war, now and then I've been sort of—fey, as the Highland folk call it. I feel things—odd things. Then I tell myself I'm an ass. All the same, if I don't act on the feelings, I generally regret it, —too late. For instance, that Sunday night at Bournemouth! Well—you know what I felt was going to happen. If I'd turned a deaf ear to the Voice—yes, it was a voice—but I can't bear to think of that, even now.”

“I can,” said Patchinka. “Petro and I would have drowned. Oh, we needn't mind Miss Wellington hearing. I've told her already, all the story. But I understand what you mean. I didn't realize Englishmen could be like that—sensitive, and having presentiments about things. One says they are too stolid. But I might have known you would not be stolid, whatever else you were. Even at first sight, when I thought you were a waiter. I might have known that. But does the Voice tell you that Laurette de Fiumine is in danger, and that I could help her if I went to Cap Martin?”

“I can't say the Voice tells me all that, or anything definite,” I apologized, sheep-faced. “I just had a sort of ‘hunch’ (as Horden calls it) that there might be something fishy. I'm afraid I was thinking more of you than of the Marquesa. If she isn't as dotty as she's supposed to be, and you could contrive to get at her, she might give you information worth having, after all—about the pearls, or your brother's papers; or both."

Patchinka sprang to her feet, with an air of high resolve. "That settles it!" she exclaimed. "We have paid our bill for the sirop, and tipped the waiter. We can go. We will have one more close look at Sacha's machine, and then you will get us the taxi for Cap Martin. There is a very large hotel there you know. And if it is full, there may be another place, smaller and cheaper. For me, after what I went through in Russia, I am not too fastidious—if I can be clean. And as for Miss Wellington, she is—an Iron Duke!"

Followed closely by Petro, we strolled to the barrier round the biplane. The crowd there was not so dense now. The sunset chill had fallen. People were going indoors, to cafes, to the Casino, or the Sporting Club; back to their hotels, or as a last resort to the evening dullness of their homes. It was easier to find faces, and I spotted the profile of Mendez almost at once. He was talking with a couple of men whom I had not seen before. All three appeared to be somewhat excited.

"I thought so!" I said to Patchinka. "There's our man!"

For an instant she did not answer, and I supposed she hadn't heard. But glancing down I saw how, with narrowed eyes, she gazed straight at Mendez. "There are our men you might say," she corrected me. "The two with him are the other ones of Sacha's syndicate. Is there not a proverb in English—'Where the body is, there will the crows gather'? There's something like it in Russian—perhaps in all languages, for it is true. My poor Sacha's Mascot is the body. Here are all three of the crows who wish to pick it to pieces, each one for his own greedy maw."

"You're sure about these new men—as sure as about Mendez?" I asked.

"Yes, I am just as sure. There is the French-Algerian, Amadeo Dupont, the thin brown man like a handsome Arab. He is quite a dandy, you see, and much younger than the others. There is Edouardo Moroni—fat and blondish, more German than Italian in his looks. I said they would all come—sooner or later, didn't I?"

"You did. And it's much sooner than later."

"Yes. Dupont and Moroni may have got here before us. And they may have come separately or together. But I think separately."

"So do I. It's in my bones (you see, I'm 'feeling' things again!) that each of these chaps sneaked here when the lottery was advertised, hoping the other two wouldn't turn up. Then they stumbled across each other on the spot, and had to make the best of it—as we are to do with Miss Horden! To my mind they don't look too happy, in spite of their gestures and palaver. Got the air of pickpockets caught trying to rob one another, and pretending it was a joke."

Patchinka nodded. "That's just it!" she approved my simile. "We mustn't stare too hard, must we?—or they will be magnetised to look at us, and suspect that we are interested. If they did suspect—no matter how they may hate one another, they would band together against us. Then would come that danger for you I warned you of."

I laughed. "I didn't get through the war with only one Blighty and a few other scratches, to come to grief through a trio of perishers like those. If they're the danger, I fiche myself of it, as the French say!"

Patchinka's dimples showed, as if with reluctance. "The French don't say it exactly like that! Of course you would not be afraid, you! But all the same, a danger would come from some direction where your back was turned."

"That's no better English than mine was French," I taunted the girl. "Well, there's one good thing,—danger or no danger—these blighters can't have got at the secret of Sacha's aeroplane already, and profited by it. If they had, there'd be no incentive to lure them to Monte Carlo from their far off beastly homes."

"I was thinking of that," the girl agreed. "But I was always very sure that they could not have found the secret. I felt they must have known vaguely of it—something Sacha let drop, perhaps, in a careless moment—one of the moments when he was like a big, happy boy. He might have boasted what he intended to do when he built the wonderful new machine these men promised to finance, to invent a hiding-place for valued things. But he would not have told them where or how he would hide what they hoped he might hide—what they could not buy, and would like to steal. You remember that the Mascot was not built in their day as a Syndicate. They would not produce the money they had promised, because Sacha would not give them more than he had promised. So I went to Vilna for the pearls; and meanwhile Mr. Horden gave that advance which saved the situation for Sacha. Oh, no, these men have had no chance for tricks since my brother died. They must have been hungry to get it! And now, they think, is their time. If we could see into their brains, we would learn in what sly way each is planning how to cheat the other."

"Perhaps we shall learn without seeing such an unpleasant sight," I mumbled encouragement. "Let's be glad we know these men, and they don't know us. Shall we start for Cap Martin now?"

"Yes," decided Patchinka. "We're ready, aren't we, Miss Wellington?"

"I'll call a taxi," I said. "And if you stay at the Cap, I'll send over your luggage later on."

Three minutes more, and we were on the road.

CHAPTER XVII.

The Amazing Success of Petro.

IT WAS not yet quite dark. The western sky still burned red with the ashes of sunset; and the east, behind the Italian mountains, was a luminous purple. The mountains were purple too, dark and velvety, and the sea was like wine with a dropped gleam here and there from some mirrored star.

Our silence was scarcely broken as the taxi spun along the curving white road, but I knew that Patchinka was thinking of Sacha. He, doubtless, had often brought her this way on that wonderful Easter holiday when she was a happy little school girl from Paris.

We plunged into the shadow of tall pines and spreading olive trees when we reached the Cap, and to our nostrils drifted a pungent perfume which was somehow sad.

"Rosemary," Patchinka murmured. "Rosemary; that's for remembrance!" And then spoke no more until the taxi slowed down at the door of a huge, illuminated hotel in the woods.

I left the girl and her chaperon in the car while I went in to enquire for rooms. Rooms? Oh, no, there were none at all. Everything was booked till the end of March. The two or three small, cheap hotels on the Cap were packed with ladies' maids, valets and chauffeurs belonging to the guests of the big one. And there was nothing else—nothing, that is, except a little pension lately started. It would not be suitable for ladies of position, was scarcely worth mentioning. Nevertheless I took the address, with directions how to find the place.

The road into which the main avenue would soon branch off, I learned led past the gates of a few villas; then turned, becoming at once an obscure lane.

"I know!" cried Patchinka, when I repeated my information to her. "The road they speak of must be the one past the Villa Persano. I remember the rough little lane beyond. I went that

Puffed Rice
The Bubble Grains

On This Dish Mothers and children agree

No other cereal food in existence compares with Puffed Grains, as you know.

Children revel in them—grains puffed to bubbles, 8 times normal size. As flimsy as snowflakes, as flavory as nuts.

Perhaps every child would pick out a Puffed Grain if offered the choice of all cereal foods known.

But this is the mother's side

To mothers who know—millions of them—Puffed Grains are the ideal form of grain food.

They are whole grains, supplying whole-grain nutrition.

Every food cell is exploded, so digestion is made easy and complete. There are 16 needed elements in wheat. Puffed Wheat makes them all available.

Made from Prof. Anderson's process—the only process by which all cells are broken. Over 100 million steam explosions are caused in every kernel.

Let children eat all they will.

legs, and funny, round ears. He waddled awkwardly over to a seat on the rock just below the raven, who repeated his question: "What were you hiding for?"

"I was listening to Mistress Ladybird whistle," answered Grimmer, "and I heard something else besides."

"Now, since you have heard so much, you should be satisfied and go home," said Blackie Longbill.

"But I haven't heard enough," said the woodchuck. "What's this about a procession, and who hasn't hatched out yet?" asked the woodchuck eagerly.

"Caterpillars, Master Grimmer," said the Ladybird.

"Oh, is that all," grunted the woodchuck.

"I like caterpillar processions," said Blackie Longbill.

"Caterpillars are too small to bother with," said the woodchuck, turning up his nose.

"Nothing is too small to bother with," said a sharp voice from just behind Grimmer.

Immediately afterwards, the woodchuck straightened up, gave a loud "Ow!", and almost fell backward under the Juniper branch.

The raven, who had glanced behind Grimmer, now hopped to the ground, where he danced excitedly and cried: "Serves you right, Old Surly Satisfied!"

"Whatever is the matter, Master Grimmer?" inquired the Ladybird anxiously.

A small, dark beetle walked around from behind the woodchuck, and stood between Grimmer and Blackie Longbill. The newcomer had a strangely-shaped body, dingy in color, an antlike head, and short wingcases, under which the wings were tightly folded. The tail part of the body was elevated, and the beetle teetered on his toes.

As soon as the woodchuck caught sight of him, he edged away quickly.

"So it was you, was it?" grunted the bristly fellow.

"Yes," replied the dark beetle. "I thought you needed a lesson. 'Nothing is too small to bother with—not even me.'"

"I should say not," grunted the woodchuck to himself.

"And who are you?" inquired the Ladybird of the black beetle.

"I am the Black Rove beetle," was the reply, "just now I'm a teacher of manners."

"A teacher of manners. Humph!" grunted the woodchuck.

"Stop grumbling, Grimmer," said the Raven. "A little nip on your tail won't hurt you."

"I notice you keep yours pretty well out of the way," said the woodchuck.

"You started it," said the Raven to the woodchuck.

"And I ended it," said the Rove beetle, whose name was Nip-Nip. "And now, to show you I am not quarrelsome, I'll give you all an invitation to view the caterpillar procession."

"When?" asked Blackie Longbill the Raven.

"Where?" inquired Grimmer the woodchuck.

"Do tell us all about it," asked the Ladybird.

The Rove beetle climbed up on a moss clump and said:

"If the splendid procession you all wish to see,

After just seven days, and just seven nights, too,

At Juniper Junction right here I will be,
To lead you to where you can get the best view."

The other three promised to meet the Rove beetle, who, after carefully folding his wings, which he had been stretching, using his curved tail to pack them closely under their cases, disappeared down a crack in the rock.

Blackie Longbill croaked a friendly "good bye" and flew homeward over the tree-tops.

Grimmer the woodchuck still sat by the scraggly Juniper as the Ladybird flew away toward the little lake. The Ladybird was whistling as she flew, and every time she turned and looked back toward Juniper Junction, she saw the bristly fellow's nose go up, and heard his cheery whistle in reply.

JUNIPER JUNCTION

A whole week had passed, but the Ladybird had not forgotten about the caterpillar procession, or the Rove beetle's invitation. She had been to Juniper Junction several times during the last seven days, and had seen nothing of Grimmer or Nip-Nip, but Blackie Longbill had croaked a greeting once as he flew high above her head.

This morning, however, she looked forward to meeting all three, for she felt sure the Rove beetle would keep his promise. So, as the Ladybird came in sight of the scraggly Juniper on the ridge-top, she looked expectantly to see if the others were waiting for her.

"The greatest slowpoke I ever saw—" began a complaining voice.

"Is Master Blackie Longbill," finished another voice, tiny but shrill.

It was the raven who had spoken first. Blackie Longbill was perched on the Juniper branch where the Ladybird had first seen him the week before. He was a much surprised bird, for he had not known that anyone except the Ladybird was near.

"You are a slowpoke, Blackie," said the shrill voice, and the speaker, Nip-Nip the Rove beetle, climbed out of a crevice of the rock.

"I've been waiting ever since sunrise," continued Nip-Nip. "If we don't hurry up, the caterpillar procession will have started. I'm afraid we will have to leave without Grimmer."

"Not if I know it," came Grimmer's voice from just behind them. "To make sure I wouldn't be late, I slept here at Juniper Junction all night."

"You'll have to carry me," said Nip-Nip to Blackie Longbill. "Grimmer is too bristly a horse to suit me."

"I'm a woodchuck, not a horse," said Grimmer, sitting up very straight, "and I wouldn't carry you, anyway."

"There is no use in quarreling," said the Ladybird. "Blackie will carry Nip-Nip, I'm sure, and we will all start off as friends."

It was quite a little journey to the North end of the woods where the pine trees formed a green wall, winter and summer. Nip-Nip sat on the raven's back, pointing out the way. The raven flew from branch to branch above the path along which the woodchuck waddled, puffing and grunting. The little Ladybird, herself, followed the others.

They were under the pines at last. The ground was thickly carpeted with red-brown needles; there was no grass, and but little underbrush. It was very still, with only the light wind of the morning laughing softly as it played with the tree-tops.

"This is the place from where the procession starts," said Nip-Nip.

"Is there going to be a band?" asked Grimmer.

"A caterpillar procession doesn't need a band," replied the Rove beetle, climbing down from the raven's shoulder to the ground.

Blackie Longbill now flew to a perch on a branch some distance from the ground, whence he now cried excitedly: "Hurray! I see them. They're getting ready to start."

"I can't see a thing down here," complained the woodchuck to the Ladybird, who was sitting up beside the raven.

"You're all right where you are," said Nip-Nip. "The procession will come our way."

The Ladybird, as well as Blackie Longbill, could see where the caterpillars had gathered together. A gauzy, balloon-like tent enveloped one of the smaller pine branches. Inside of this tent, countless, red-striped caterpillars, each about an inch long, were squirming and hurrying to and fro.

As the Ladybird and the raven watched, one of the caterpillars appeared at a small opening in the lower part of the silken house, and crawled along the branch toward the tree-trunk. Another followed, then another—the procession had begun. Through the doorway of their home, the caterpillars poured in seemingly endless line, following their leader as he made a sure, though careful way down the tree-trunk.

The raven flew from his perch to the ground and stood beside the woodchuck. The Rove beetle waited at the foot of the tree until the caterpillars reached the ground, and then led the procession over the pine-needle carpet. Suddenly, Nip-Nip began to rush backward and forward between his companions and the procession, exclaiming:

"Keep back! Don't crowd the parade."

"Why all the fuss, Nip-Nip?" asked Grimmer.

"I'm the police," replied the beetle, trying to look important.

Blackie Longbill laughed at this, but the Ladybird noticed that both he and Grimmer did as Nip-Nip ordered.

The little Ladybird had never seen so many caterpillars together before. She wondered at their numbers, but wondered still more at their strange, silent procession. Together with her friends, she followed the long line of Pine Caterpillars beyond the shade of the trees.

"I say, Nip-Nip, where is this procession heading for, anyway?" asked Grimmer.

It was a strange sight to the Ladybird. The red-backed creepers moved slowly and steadily onward, never stopping to feed when they reached the grasses and plants that grew where there were no pine-needles.

"The procession will have to turn around and go back home pretty soon," said Blackie Longbill to the Ladybird. "They are getting too far away from the pine trees."

"What difference does that make?" asked the Ladybird.

"They eat only green pine-needles," explained the raven.

The caterpillars moved away from the trees toward a bare, sandy spot near the fence. It was quite sunny here, but the soil, though dry, was not hard and caked.

When the head of the procession reached this bare spot, it halted. At this, the Rove beetle rushed to the leader of the caterpillars, exclaiming: "Move on there! You're spoiling the march."

But the caterpillars paid no attention; instead, they all massed together in a wriggling heap for a moment. Then, each one for himself, they started digging holes. They worked fast and furiously, and as they dug deeper and deeper, each caterpillar disappeared in the hole he had made, and did not come out again.

"Where is your procession now?" laughed Blackie Longbill.

The Rove beetle really knew nothing of the true reason for the caterpillar's disappearance, but he pretended to.

"O, my procession has just gone in for a rest," said Nip-Nip.

Grimmer the woodchuck laughed quietly. He had been saying little since the digging began, but he knew much, for he now said:

"They have gone for a good rest, Nip-Nip. I'm not going to wait, for I know it will be weeks before anyone comes out of those little holes. Even then you will not see caterpillars; they will have turned into moths."

"I'm going to be around when they do come out," said the raven, "and I'll let you know when they are ready."

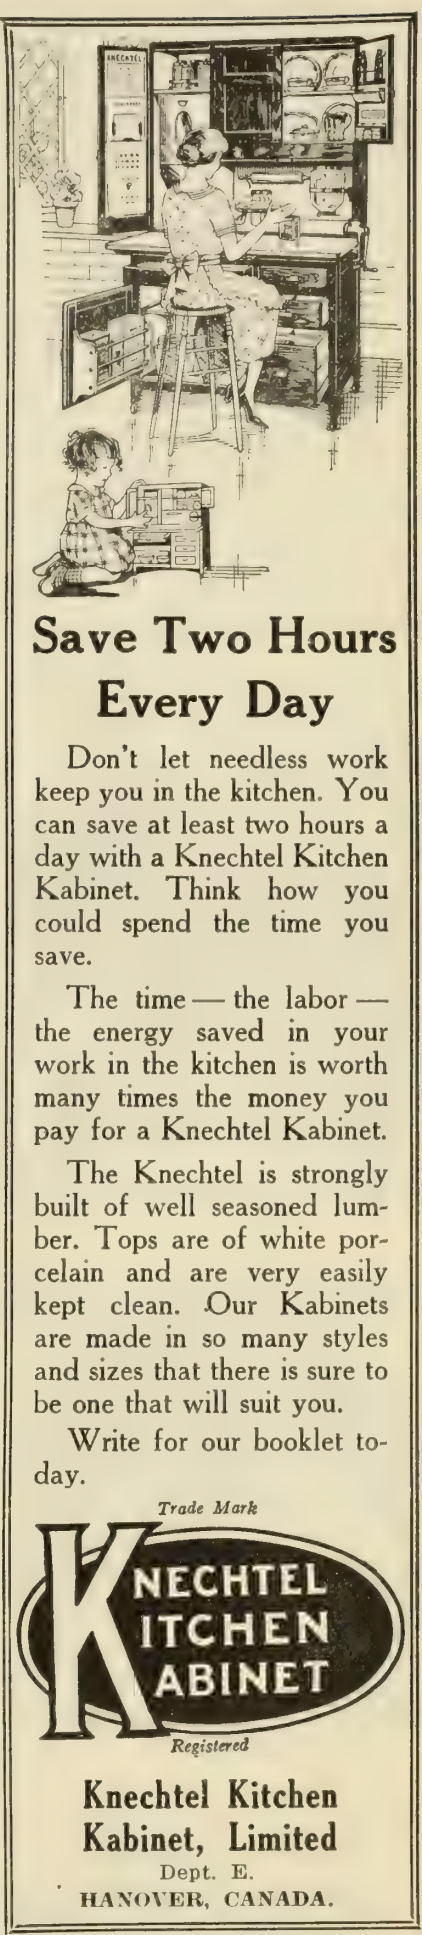

"But you don't know when that will be," laughed the Ladybird.

"I'll find out from Grimmer," said Blackie Longbill.

The raven flew away over the tree tops and the Ladybird and the woodchuck left the Rove beetle busily filling up the caterpillar doorways with sand.

Grimmer came with the Ladybird back to Juniper Junction, and as the Ladybird left him, the bristly fellow said:

"I've seen processions by the score, But none so gay and grand, Though I'd have liked this one much more, If there had been a band."

way with Sacha and Laurette to look for violets. When I found them, oh, but thousands, blue and big as wood nymphs' eyes!—I forgot everything else, and that was what those two wanted. I was a good chaperon. And I gave half my violets to Laurette. She kissed me for them—and perhaps a little for myself. How the memory rushes back! I'm glad now you would bring me to Cap Martin, though I didn't want to come.

Presently our smart taxi had bumped us into the lane in question, which had a vile surface, and a divine roof of silvered olive-branches, interlaced. There was only one house which could possibly be a pension, a box-like house which might have been enlarged and modernized from peasant origin. It was set back a little behind a low wall, with an olive tree or two in front; and it had a somewhat forbidding facade of new gret stucco.

"This won't do for you, I'm afraid," I said regretfully, "even if they've got rooms."

"It will do!" cried Patchinka, in sudden excitement. "I remember the place now, though it's quite changed, and twice as big as it was. A dairyman named Rossi lived here, who had lots of lovely white cows, Madame di Fiumine made her chef take all the milk for the Villa Persane, from him. He'd been a faithful servant of hers. If he's still there—if he is the one who keeps the pension we can find out perhaps about poor Laurette."

She had jumped out of the taxi, eager to go with me to the door. As I fumbled with the latch of the gate which was elusive in the dusk, there was a burst of music from the house. So unexpected was it, that involuntarily I paused. A guitar had begun to twang, and two voices broke into song; a woman's voice and a man's. Hers was a very sweet though slightly tired soprano. His was tenor or light baritone, not at its freshest, not perfectly trained perhaps, but luscious, with some poignant quality that touched my heart and gave it a squeeze. I had never heard the song before, but the pair were singing it in the language of love—Italian; and all my pent-up, suppressed worship of the little girl at my side rushed to my throat in a wave that choked my breath.

"By Jove!" I muttered. "They can sing, whoever they are. Shall we wait and hear them through?"

"Oh, yes!" Patchinka agreed. "We could not interrupt. Their voices are warm and sweet as sunlight on flowers in the south."

It was all I could do not to snatch her hand and hold it against my heart while the duet went on. But I did nothing of the sort. I didn't even touch her dress. And the passion of love and parting in the song made me miserable beyond words because I was sure Patchinka was not thinking of me—perhaps never would think of me as I wanted her to think.

There was a pattering of applause and a spurt of talk after the last notes had trailed into silence. Quickly I opened the gate, and as together we reached the porch with its common fan-shaped roof of glass, I pushed an electric button. The talking ceased as if it had been turned off at a tap. After two or three minutes a young woman appeared at the door, a plump figure and her head silhouetted against hard electric light and a white wall.

"Does this house still belong to Monsieur Rossi?" Patchinka anxiously asked, in her perfect French.

"It is called the Pension Rossi, but Old Monsieur Rossi is dead. I am his daughter-in-law. His son, my husband, and I keep the pension," was the quick answer. "Mademoiselle—Madame—knew my father-in-law?"

"It's Mademoiselle," cut in Patchinka. "I am—Miss Smith. When I was young, and here with my brother, I used to know your father a little, and liked him. I hope you have two rooms free in your pension. One for myself, one for my friend Miss Wellington, who is in the taxi."

"Will not Mademoiselle and Monsieur her brother step inside?" enquired Madame Rossi.

"This is not my brother. He is a friend," Patchinka explained without the faintest flattering blush as we accepted the invitation. "He is staying at Monte Carlo."

The dark eyes of Madame Rossi took in the details of Miss Smith's pretty travelling dress, cloak and hat, which did my taste so much credit. "I have two rooms disengaged," she said. "We have been open only a few weeks, and are not much known yet. I should be charmed to have these ladies as our guests, but—I am afraid we cannot offer quite the luxury they are accustomed to. It is best to say that frankly at once, so there can be no reproach. We have staying here two Swiss ladies who keep a shop in Lucerne, they tell me, and a gentleman and lady once of the opera in Naples, who have come hoping to get some private engagements—or to sing at hotels. There are no others—no grand people. And only one bathroom. Now that Mademoiselle understands perhaps she—"

"I think it will be exactly what we want," Patchinka filled up the questioning pause. "I'll call my friend Miss Wellington and you will show us the rooms. Oh—I hope you won't mind a dog?"

The word must have caught Petro's ear and been recognized as something connected with himself. Before Madame Rossi could reply he had disengaged his collar from Miss Wellington's slight hold, leapt from the open window of the taxi, sprawled for an instant, recovered his balance, and bounded to the side of his adored one.

"Mon Dieu!" shrieked Madame Rossi in shrill cry.

Her cry was penetrating. Hardly was it uttered when a closed door burst open, and two men appeared on the threshold. Behind them were women; two respectable grey heads which would have been German if they hadn't been Swiss; and one not so aggressively respectable, of henna-auburn.

Petro, fawning upon Patchinka protectingly, gazed at the others as if they had been so much furniture. But this gave relief not offence, to the party.

"Quel monstre!" gasped Madame. "It is surely not a dog, this!"

"It is a British bull-dog, who has flown in a French plane and barked at the Boches," I explained hurriedly, seeing that Patchinka flushed as if she had been slapped. "He may look a monster to you, but he is an angel at heart."

I had made a hit! Everyone laughed. "Barked at the Boches!" echoed Madame, and ventured to pat Petro, who smiled as none but he had ever smiled—a smile which seemed to wag his funny tail. The lady with the henna hair (evidently the singer) went upon her knees to the creature who'd barked at the Boches, and kissed his forehead, cooing with ecstasy. Monsieur Rossi, a good expoliu type; the tenor, fat and sentimental; Madame Rossi herself, still trembling! and even the two stiffly corseted Swiss ladies threw themselves at Petro's head. It was a credit to the dog he kept it.

The best of everything in the house was at the ladies' service, and the business of our quest at Cap Martin was settled.

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Laurette Mystery.

I urged Patchinka to go back with me and dine at Monte Carlo. Forgetful of my tacit promise to Miss Horden—forgetful even of the young woman's existence—I suggested some famous restaurant—Giro's perhaps. We shouldn't be in evening kit, but that needn't matter for once. We could talk over tomorrow's campaign, and—but I was cut firmly short.

No. I had advised coming to Cap Martin. I had had a mysterious presentiment about Laurette di Fiumine. Providence had brought us to the very place where we might learn all that we needed to know. We were here, on the spot, and Patchinka for one was determined not to waste a minute. As for 'talking things over,' why should not I stay and dine at the Pension Rossi?—unless I were too proud!

Too proud! I would have eaten bread and cheese, or bread without cheese, in a mud hut, with this girl, and imagined myself feasting in a palace. I wondered how it was that she didn't guess my state of mind. Probably she didn't concentrate enough upon me to guess anything beneath the surface, or even care a tinker's Anything what was there.

Still coolly oblivious of Miss Horden, I accepted the invitation, spun back to Monte, ordered my rather modest luggage sent to the British Hotel, and engaged an extra taxi as well to whisk the ladies' bags and boxes to Cap Martin.

It was not until after seven, when we were about to dine in the clean, bare salle a manger of the Pension that I remembered Miss Horden. Good Heavens, what had I actually promised her? I tried to recall my words, and couldn't. But there had been some suggestion concerning the Casino later in the evening. Hang it all, she'd have a right to think me rude unless I turned up, and I didn't want Henry Horden's daughter to think me rude!

"What is the matter with it, mon ami?" Patchinka wanted to know.

"N-nothing," I hedged.

"It is that you don't want to distress me. But you have forgotten something—something important?"

"Not important."

"Please tell me."

I told her, laughing. "It's too late to do anything now. I'll apologise tomorrow. Of course there's no telephone in this shack—"

"But there is. They advertise 'comfort moderne,' and they've put in a telephone instead of central heating because it cost less and sounded just as chic. You must phone to Miss Horden at once. We will wait for you, Miss Wellington and I—and see that your soup is kept hot. Yes, there is soup! Don't you smell it? One would say it is made altogether of the onions!"

So that was how Miss Horden got to know that I had—let's say, interests, at Cap Martin. Her knowing it didn't seem to matter tuppence at the time and when she enquired over the phone if I were at the Grand Hotel, I replied promptly in the negative. "Where are you then?" was a question I couldn't well refuse to answer, so I gave the name of the Pension Rossi.

"You've got friends there?"

"Yes. And fearfully important business with them. That's why I—"

"Well, I suppose you won't be with them all night? Can't you come and take me to the Casino. I've just refused—another person, because I counted on you."

Mendez! thought I. The man had got hold of her already. Quick work! Not that his getting hold of her could hurt us—so far as I was able to see. Still, the girl has sacrificed her sitting room for my sake, and I owed her a debt of gratitude.

"All right. I'll call for you at half-past nine if you won't mind my not being in evening togs," I grumbled.

Patchinka glanced at Miss Wellington when I told her. "Do you still believe," she smiled as one smiles at an infant, "that Miss Horden would move away from your hotel if her father cabled money?"

"Why not?" I challenged.

"Mon pauvre petit garcon!" she pitied me, and changed the subject when I asked her to explain. Of course I did begin to see what she meant; but it was nonsense; just what one girl—even a girl like Patchinka Kapiecha—would think about another.

She had spent the time of my absence, it appeared, in tactfully pumping Madame Rossi about the Marchesa di Fiumine. She'd freely confessed her meeting with the Marquesa in the Spring before the war, and asked innocently if the lady still came down from Paris each winter to the Villa Persane. Then out poured the gossip of the Cap!

"It does seem as if your 'feeling' might be right," the girl went on, lowering her voice to a mysterious whisper, as she leaned across the small table to me. "Old Rossi died a year ago, and his son and daughter-in-law were never in Laurette's service, as he was. They sold the cows and gave up the laiterie, to build and start the Pension, so there's no coming and going between this house and the villa. Still the Rossis are interested and curious, evidently trying all the time to find out things about cette pauvre dame, si jolie, si gentille." The horrid husband came here, a few months after the war, and people were angry that he should be allowed back in France, because it was never believed that he was really interned in Meran. The gossip was, that he'd known the war would soon break out, and had sneaked into Austria to take his 'cure' on purpose to be there while the war was on. But it was only gossip—there was no proof. He'd been let out with other French and Italian prisoners; and he had a right to join his wife.

"She'd been suspected and persecuted on his account in Paris, you know. You yourself told me of that in Bourne-mouth, and how you'd read in the papers about her seeking refuge at Cap Martin. Here, the people knew her too well to believe any evil of their dear kind lady. She was so sweet to everybody—so good to the poor! Before the war she was in the South only for the season. But when she came for refuge, she stayed on, summer and winter. At first she seemed quite herself, Madame Rossi says, though sad and quiet. Then, quite suddenly, she stopped going out even for the long, lonely walks she had loved in the woods. She hid herself in the house and inside her own gates; and one of the servants at the Villa told Madame Rossi that she cried and cried, and scarcely ate. No one knew what was the matter, but I think I know. It must have been when she read the news of Sacha's death. They adored each other, those two. But Laurette is good. She has a white soul, and would never permit anything in their love to be ashamed of, and to repent. But her husband's health was always bad; he was a dissipated man. Maybe she and Sacha had some hope of the future. And then—to lose him. It must almost have killed Laurette."

"Not long after these days of her grief began, the Marquesa arrived, en bombe. How terrible for Laurette that a base creature like that should exist while glorious Sacha was gone! The servants talked about a dreadful scene between Laurette and her husband. It was partly about money, partly about something else—Sacha, perhaps. The wretch may have found letters, or photographs—who knows? He telegraphed for a doctor, a friend of his, to come from Italy—Turin, Madame Rossi says—and even when the Marquesa went back to Italy, the doctor stayed on at the Villa Persane. He is old, Madame Rossi says, with a quite bald head that shines, a big nose and the brightest black eyes she ever saw. He looks as if he could take in everything in the world with one glance." That's the way she expressed it. And people think that he is as much gaoler as doctor; that the wicked husband keeps Laurette shut up as if she were mad, until she signs over her money to him—or else in hopes that she may die. Just what you suggested! So you see, you were not wrong; there is a mystery. "It looks like it," I said, when I'd concentrated on details of the story, in spite of Petro's heavy head on one of my feet, and Miss Wellington crumbling her bread in a way that no man can stand without getting the jumps. "But, if there's anything in it, how did those two chaps—the husband and the doctor—get the poor lady into their power? It's her own house, with her own servants in it, and—"

"Oh, but you can imagine what servants would be like if they were told by a doctor that their mistress was insane! They'd be frightened-like rabbits. If she begged them to help her to escape, or even to take messages, they wouldn't dare do it. Besides, poor darling!—Laurette may indeed have been driven out of her mind by this time. One thing Madame Rossi mentioned makes me afraid it may be so."

"What's that?"
"Laurette worshipped music. That was one of the first ties between her and Sacha. He was sitting at the piano improvising, in a way he had—of, too adorable he used to look at the piano, my Sacha! His eyes half closed as if he was lost in dreams, a cigarette in his mouth, his head thrown back! That was how Laurette saw him first, in Paris, at the house of a friend. She told me so herself. She could not live without music in those days. Now, her piano is never heard. And wandering singers, or men with violins who used to be allowed inside the gates—clever special ones whom she knew, not vulgar horrors—are driven away by the lodge-keeper, on the doctor's orders. I do believe that the wicked creature is keeping music from her, not for her good, but to do her harm—to kill the poor lamb, or drive her completely out of her wits from dullness—from eternal boredom. Think what it must be like, month after month, never going outside her garden gates, having lost all hope as well as love! And she is still young—no more than thirty—and so beautiful!"

"Ah!" I ejaculated, striving to look inspired. "We must think up a great plan to find out the whole truth about her, as soon as possible, and then do something, not only for her sake, but for yours."

"I have already thought of a plan," Patchinka said, "I hope it is great. But we shall see. No! I can't tell you to-night. I want to take it to bed with me, and then—in my dreams, to Sacha. That is what I believe, you know. We go to those we call 'dead,' when we dream; and even if we don't remember what happens, we bring back inspirations."

She looked so wonderful when she said this, that I believed every word of it. And despite the onion soup—which the Swiss Ladies loved, and ate aloud—the room seemed filled with mystery and romance.

CHAPTER XIX.

The Lady's Age.

THE British Hotel at Monte Carlo had two entrances, one for the hotel proper (more or less) and one for the bar. The former plunged you into a small entrance-hall full of froust and furnished with a few wicker chairs and tables. When I dashed in, ten minutes late for my appointment, I almost fell over Miss Horden and Mendez, having coffee and cigarettes together. I mumbled "I told you so!" to myself, before apologising to the girl.

Mendez and I were introduced to each other, and he was explained as I knew he would be; an old friend of her mother's, had heard the name of Horden mentioned, and had ventured to speak on the strength of that acquaintance. "Mr. Mendez has the table next to mine," Miss Wendela vouchsafed, slightly "miffed" in her manner to me. "But when you threw me over, I invited him to come and sit with me and talk about Holland."

She evidently expected jealousy on my part, and threw Mendez a flirtatious glance from her big, light blue eyes, as though to say, "Holland wasn't the only subject of our conversation, was it?" Mendez responded with a warm gleam fifteen years too young to fit him, and my sole emotion was a faint disgust. It was only my respect and—yes, something like affection, for Henry S. which saved me from flaunting my indifference. "Saved" may not sound like the right word, but it is. If I'd acted then on my impulse, a fishing smack wrecked in port before it had ever made a haul, would have been my brother.

For Henry's sake I laid myself out to be polite to his offspring. And to prevent the girl, if I could, from making a fool of herself over Mendez, I tried to climb back onto the pedestal where she'd placed me as an Englishman. Anyhow, Mendez wasn't English! In spite of my failings, I scored over him there.

He walked with us to the Casino, telling the tale of his ancient wins, but in the Atrium were Dupont and Moroni; and rather than risk having to introduce them to Miss Horden, he joined them.

The girl led me to the vestiare, where I left my hat, and she an expensive, tasteless cloak. She then took me into the bureau opposite, and showed me with a possessive air, how to get my ticket of admission to the gambling rooms.

"We must play roulette," she said, "because the smallest stake at trente et quarante is a louis, and till I get my next cheque I can't go above a wretched five franc piece—unless I win a lot, and build up the bank's money. But I bet I shall win tonight! I've got a hunch you'll bring me luck. Do you know what a 'hunch' is, you English soldier boy?"

"Your father told me," I almost said, but not quite. In fact it wasn't necessary to answer at all. Miss Horden didn't give me time. That was the one thing about her which was restful. I soon found out; you didn't have to worry much when you were with Wendela what to say next. She seldom stopped talking long enough to give you a chance to say anything.

"You'll stake for me, won't you?" she went on. "Amateurs always have luck. And I suppose you are an amateur at roulette, aren't you?"

Well, I wasn't exactly. There was a chap in my regiment who hid a little portable wheel of his own in his kit; and sometimes we—but no matter. Wendela didn't really want to know whether I was an amateur or not. She wanted to think I was, so that she might have the fun of teaching me to play; therefore I meekly let her do it.

We walked into a vast and decorative room, which she informed me was the Salle Schmidy. My eyes were soothed rather than dazzled by the mellow, yellow light, which looked like illuminated gold dust—dust of all the gold that had ever passed through the hands of gamblers since the Casino was built.

But there was no gold now on the tables. Wendela explained that all those discs of different shapes and colours had represented money since the war; and she believed that they made people reckless. It never seemed important if you lost useless things like that.

She had a "lucky table," she told me. Not that she'd been lucky there lately! But I was going to "pull her up again." Hers was the first table in the middle as you went up the room. I must push through the crowd gathered round it, and she would follow close at my back, till we could get near enough to place our stakes. This was easier said than done, because it seemed to be the lucky table of a good many others besides Miss Horden—strong, energetic people, quite as capable of pushing as we were and of keeping their places behind the sixteen seated players when they'd secured them. We did wedge ourselves in, however, like meat in a sandwich, Miss Horden's chin on my shoulder, my chin pricked by a plume on a short woman's tall hat.

"What number do you feel will win?" Wendela's breath tickled my ear. "You must decide. What about my age—nineteen?"

Her father had mentioned that she was twenty-five, and her plumpness made her look it. "I don't feel that is coming up," I said diplomatically. "What I do—(I thought of Patchinka, quaint little creature, talking to Madame Rossi of 'when she was young')—'What I do feel is—twenty-two.'"

"Put on my five francs quickly, then!" gasped my task mistress—and one for yourself, of course, if you like."

I did like, because twenty-two at that moment represented all of Patchinka within sight or sound. Twenty-two was her age, and was black, which matched my mood when I thought of her, far off at the Pension Rossi, while I was in the Casino at Monte Carlo with another girl—a fat, uninteresting, inappropriate girl. Altogether the number suited my mood, though I placed our pathetic five franc pieces without the slightest conviction that twenty-two would win.

You could have knocked me down with the feather that brushed my Adam's apple when the wheel had spun and the croupier sang out "Vingt deux, noir, pair et passe!"

Each of us had gained thirty-five times the stake.

"Wonderful!" purred Miss Horden. "I knew what would happen. I said you'd turn my luck, and that you'd more than repay me for giving you my room, didn't I? You're a dear boy! Now what shall we do next?"

"The sensible thing would be to pocket our money and go home," I replied, remembering that portable roulette wheel and some tricks it had served me. "But what I want to do, is to leave four of my louis on twenty-two for a repeat."

"How smart of you! Why, you talk like an old player!" cried Wendela. "Do with mine what you do with yours."

I did, and blessed if twenty-two didn't come up again. This time we each made thirty-five times four louis, which was a rather different affair from our first small bit of luck. One hundred and forty louis for me and the same for Wendela!

"I declare I could kiss you!" cried she. I pretended not to hear, but others heard, and grinned; among them the syndicate trio who had tracked us to this table. "I'm going for twenty-two once more, this time with the maximum, nine louis," I announced.

"How ever did you know the maximum for a number en plein?" panted Wendela. "You've never played before, so you must be clairvoyant. I believe you are. Twenty-two simply can't come up three times in succession. Still—the maximum on it for me too."

If you'll believe it, twenty-two did perform the feat! and while we were being paid quantities of queer-shaped discs which denoted large sums, people who kept count of the game were saying that, no wonder twenty-two had appeared thrice running. The sacred camel of a number hadn't been up before in three whole hours!

I was a little dazed by my own luck, and told myself that, for Miss Horden's sake if not for my own, I ought to do the reasonable thing: stop. But I didn't wish to stop. I wished obstinately to go on.

"And now, my Mascot, what is our next move?" cooed the girl—that utterly wrong girl in the right place.

"Shan't we go? We ought to."

"Do you feel like going?"

"No."

"Then we won't go. What is your inspiration?"

"Nine; and rouge."

(Nine letters for the name "Patchinka," and rouge for the colour of my love and heart.)

"It goes for nine!"

I almost liked Wendela, in spite of her heavy chin and the equally heavy scent she used. She was anyhow a sport!

The reward of her courage was a fourth big win. A thousand francs on the even chance and another one hundred and forty louis on the number, for I had staked the maximum again.

Flushed with success, Miss Horden yearned to try her own luck, and put mine to the test with hers. I let her take my place, therefore, and watched her feverishly push our two stakes on to zero. "I just know zero will come out!" she cried; and a few other gamblers followed her play because of the phenomenal luck we had had so far. But alas, zero was in a retiring mood. He stayed in, though we coaxed him twice; and then, in fury at her failure after my success, Wendela was more than ready to go. "Come along, Boy!" she cried. "I feel just weak. Take me to Ciro's and give me some supper, and while we're there we'll count our winnings."

One would have thought by her tone that she had led me about on a leash for years! I hoped that no one had heard! But something drew my eyes across the table, and I saw—Miss P. Smith and Miss Wellington.

They were beautifully dressed. They were looking at me, and laughing—yes, laughing.

I forgot to bow. How dared they come over here to Monte all alone, without me, without a word of warning, and looking such swells—while I was still in my travelling clothes? I felt angry, hurt. Then I suddenly grinned. But the grin was too late. Miss P. Smith and her chaperon had turned away. They went quickly and with resolution. The very expression of their backs said "Don't come after us. We don't want you to speak. Go with your Miss Horden."

My Miss Horden. But I had to go with her, a plump arm linked in mine.

"You've only just got to tell me what you want me to do for you, to pay you for this, you nice, tall English boy!" she was cooing, with a squeeze of my arm.

I almost dropped hers. But something saved me again at the crucial moment.

Yes. Once more "saved" is the right word!

The Oil of Joy

Then she shrunk back abashed, for his eyelids slowly lifted. Only for a few moments, however, and they closed again. A few minutes afterwards he sat up dazedly. Molly sat back on her ankles.

"You're not going to die, then," she announced with relief in her voice, but somewhat embarrassed lest he should have heard her confession.

"Die!" exclaimed Hugh, weakly but with unmistakable heartiness, "Not on your life! Not if I know it—now. Molly, did you mean it?"

"Mean what?" innocently, as she gazed out over the lake.

"What you said when you thought I was done for. Oh, Molly, don't pretend. Say it again."

And Molly did.

The sun shone warmly down upon them. The white gulls circled about in silent, joyous flight, and the waves laughed together as they watched. This was Spring.

To Norma later, said Molly, starry-eyed and breathless,

"Why, Norma, he just loved me. I never tried to fascinate him at all, and I'm glad I didn't. It's all just a perfect gift of the gods."

"Maybe so, admitted Norma, smiling wisely, "still I do contend that it pays to advertise."

Summer Camps for Girls

at an Anglo-Indian Camp at Ootacamund near Madras which unfortunately I was not able to do. And then last June I had the pleasure of visiting a Camp at Newcastle, Ireland, and in spite of troublous times there was a contagious spirit of merriment at that lovely Seaside Camp which nestled at the foot of the Mourne Mountains.

"Camping" means something different in the old world from what it does here. Not often does it mean living in tents and rarely does it mean having a whole lake and a wilderness to explore as is frequently our delight in Canada and I have heard of one "Old World" Camp where the girls consider themselves lucky if they can collect enough small sticks and twigs during all their hikes to have one little fire on the last night. If only we could share the unlimited supply of underbrush and drift wood from our northern forests and lakes for a real roaring Canadian bonfire! Still in spite of the differences, the appeal is the same to the girl of Japan or Burma, or Ireland or Canada and the very word "Camp" or its equivalent, conjures up fascinating memories in the minds of all of us who have been fortunate enough to know what the magic word means.

Your Home Reflects Your Personality

YOU are judged by your home to a very great extent. To paraphrase an old saying—"Show me your home and I'll tell you what you are."

How frequently one sees a home robbed of its value and no longer beautiful through lack of proper surface protection.

There is really no good reason for the shabby, dingy home falling into disrepair. It is so absurdly simple to transform the weather-worn exterior or the shabby interior into a pleasing harmony of color by means of

PRICE TWENTY CENTS

The Happiest Time of Her Life

Admiration, attention—groups of eager young men awaiting her appearance, and more partners than she can dance with—this makes girlhood days the happiest time of a woman's life.

To miss this popularity is a tragedy. Yet many girls are socially unsuccessful because of some lack in charm.

What constitutes this charm is hard to define—but one thing is certain. The popular girl, the successful girl, the gay, happy, all-admired girl is always distinguished by a fresh, radiant skin.

How to have this perfect complexion is the problem of many girls, but we can solve it for you. It's a simple secret, discovered many thousand years ago.

What spoils complexions

Every day your skin accumulates a coating of dust, dirt and general soil. Every day you apply powder, and every day most women use a little or much cold cream. This dirt, powder and cold cream penetrate the tiny skin pores and fill them. Perspiration completes the clogging. You can judge for yourself what happens if you fail to wash these accumulations away.

Once a day your skin needs careful, thorough cleansing to remove these clogging deposits. Otherwise you will soon be afflicted with coarseness, blackheads and blotches.

How soap beautifies

Mild, pure, soothing soap, such as Palmolive, is a simple yet certain beautifier. Its profuse, creamy lather penetrates the network of skin pores and dissolves all dangerous deposits. Gentle rinsing carries them away.

When your skin is thus cleansed, it quickly responds with fresh, smooth radiance. The healthful stimulation results in natural, becoming color.

And the lotion-like qualities of the Palmolive lather keep your complexion delightfully soft.

Now, when your skin is healthfully clean, is the time to apply cold cream. Now, powder and that touch of rouge are harmless.

You can perfect your good complexion and beautify one not so good by the means of this simple cosmetic cleansing.

Cleopatra's way

With all classic peoples, bathing was a daily rite never neglected. The ruins of Cleopatra's sumptuous marble bath are ample proof of her faith in this ancient beauty secret.

Palm and olive oils were the cleansers used—the same bland oriental oils we blend scientifically in Palmolive.

The lotion-like qualities which made them the most highly prized of all old world beautifiers, are imparted to Palmolive Soap.

A 10-cent luxury

The vast volume in which we produce Palmolive to supply the world-wide demand naturally lowers cost. If made in small quantities the price would be at least 25 cents. Manufacturing economy permits us to offer this finest facial soap for only 10 cents. Thus you can afford to share Cleopatra's favorite luxury.

Use Palmolive for bathing and let it do for your body what it does for your face.

EDITORIAL CHAT

IS there any other month of the year which means so much to us as June? It seems the fulfilment of the spring-time, the month for which we have been waiting through all the frosts of February and winds of March. Yes, I know that some of you like the winter better than any other season, but you are welcome to it—even when it is brightened by the Northern Lights. Give me the green and rose of the first month of summer, and let the bracing days be forgotten. The scientists and philosophers all tell us that the winter is necessary, in order that our grain and our fruits should be the unsurpassed products that they are. Even the poets are with them in their high estimate of the North, and declare to us that a "conqueror never came from the South." We Canadians did not like "Our Lady of the Snows," which Mr. Kipling wrote a quarter-of-a-century ago; but we had ourselves to blame for the advertising of our winter. After all, "Our Lady of the Snows" is a beautiful name, and belongs to us for six months of the year. However, Canada is Our Lady of the Sunshine, too, and enjoys every moment of her summer-time. We are publishing, on our editorial page this month, a photograph by Mr. I. T. Parker of High River, Alberta, showing the beauties of that district in the days of warmth and fragrance. Mr. Parker is a true artist in his use of the camera and has sent us such beautiful studies of foliage, clouds and flowers that we should like to publish all of them.

Speaking of spring-time and summer reminds us that most of the spring poetry which reaches us comes too late. Of course, we admit that the publishing requirements of magazines are hard on the spring poet. The spring poem must either be kept for a year or reach us in January or February, when the snow is on the ground. It is beyond the vision of most poets to catch a glimpse of the blackbird on the pussy willows when the pipes are frozen and they are telephoning for the plumber and for extra coal. Years ago, a New York magazine published an announcement to the effect that all spring poetry must be "in" by February twenty-second. This regulation brought a poetic protest from no less a humorist than our own writer, Ethelwyn Wetherald, whose lines made a plaintive and topical appeal.

We dislike to say that we receive too much poetry; but, as a matter of fact, we are in possession of accepted verse, free and restrained, rhymed and unrhymed, to keep this magazine tuneful until November. We know that our readers appreciate the poems which we publish from month to month; but we cannot use all the poetic contributions which come to us—and those whose verses are returned may rest assured that the conventional editorial comment is true:—"this rejection implies no lack of literary merit."

The majority of those whose manuscripts or drawings we return seem to be experienced workers who take the "return" purely as a matter of business and sometimes send us other efforts. There are a few ultra-sensitive writers of fiction and illustrators who appear to regard a return of story, poem or picture as a personal affront. Two months ago, a poem was sent to us, accompanied by the would-be-cutting remark: "You have been publishing such poor poetry that you may care for this, by way of contrast." Now, you will admit that this was a tactless note for an aspiring contributor to address to the editor. The poem did not appeal to the editorial judgment as one worth publishing; but it was difficult to read it without resentment of the writer's discourtesy. It is not necessary to send a letter with the manuscript. The latter speaks for itself. All that is needed is name and address of the sender, which should always be written on the first page of the contribution.

We do not wish to receive hand-written stories or articles. The type-writer should be used by any author who desires to please the editorial eye and save valuable time. A few writers send legible copy which hardly demands typing—but these are the minority. There is a general demand to-day among editors for type-written copy—and the demand is likely to become more insistent. It is also respectfully requested that contributors send a stamped and addressed envelope for return of manuscripts, for, in some instances, stories and articles have to wend their weary way homeward.

The matter of cover designs is of deep interest to us and appears to excite the ambition of many young artists. At present, we have on hand accepted cover designs up to the month of October:—and several artists are experimenting with the November and Christmas covers for our special use. We know that you must have liked our May cover with its merry dancers. The June is reminiscent of the "Wool work," dear to our grandmothers. These two covers are the work of Anna Wilhelm, a Saskatchewan artist who is evidently fond of flowers and at home in depicting gardens and those who love them. We think the blue of the June cover is especially attractive, with its suggestion of summer sky:—and the aspect of "God's own Outdoors"—as Dr. Henry Van Dyke has called it—belongs to summer's first month.

We know that you have noticed the first cookery articles by our new editor of the culinary department, Miss Frances M. McNally. Perhaps you have already tried some of the salads which were so temptingly described in our May issue and you may have profited by the advice regarding picnic luncheons. There has been much picnic progress since the days when we "took chances" with the basket, with the sad result that the custard pie became involved with the pickles.

Then there was the out-door porch article by Collier Stevenson which is followed this month by an article on the kitchen:—with all manner of hints for the bride who wishes to have her new kitchen the most spick and-span room imaginable. There is no mistake about it:—man is passionately interested in the kitchen, for it is there that the delectable dishes which are to satisfy the masculine appetite are to be made. Wherefore, the kitchen should be the most convenient apartment imaginable, with all the facilities for culinary operations close at hand:—yet not too close. In the article and pictures which Mr. Stevenson has given us for June you will read descriptions of such kitchens as you would find so pleasant, as well as practical, that you would simply hate to go out of them.

In the leafy month of June

Boil clothes with FELS-NAPTHA?

Be sure the soap you use has real naptha in it. If you can't smell real naptha, it isn't Fels-Naptha.

Improves every washing-machine

Fels-Naptha makes the washing-machine do even better work. The real naptha in Fels-Naptha loosens the dirt before the washing-machine starts its work. Then the Fels-Naptha soapy water churns through and through the clothes, quickly flushing away all the dirt.

Campers write enthusiastically that Fels-Naptha washes greasy dishes and dish-cloths even in cold spring-water, and washes them clean. Any brook is a laundry with Fels-Naptha Soap.

Boil clothes with Fels-Naptha if you wish. After all the years that women have been used to boiling clothes, it seems hard to believe that with Fels-Naptha boiling isn't necessary. Yet Fels-Naptha makes the dirt let go in water of any temperature—and makes clothes sanitary.

The real naptha combined with splendid soap in Fels-Naptha does the work, with only a little rubbing; so the temperature of the water is a matter of personal preference. Thousands of housewives tell us of the remarkable results they get with Fels-Naptha and boiling water. But those who wash clothes the Fels-Naptha way—with cool or lukewarm water—are saved the discomfort to hands, and the bother and expense of boiling. They save clothes, too, because Fels-Naptha with cool or lukewarm water does not weaken the fibre. By giving clothes a naptha cleansing and a soap-and-water cleansing Fels-Naptha makes them clean through and through. Thoroughly clean clothes last longer; and they are healthful.

Fels-Naptha is more than soap. It is more than soap and naptha. It is the exclusive Fels-Naptha blend of splendid soap and real naptha in a way that brings out the best in these two great cleaners. Begin using Fels-Naptha today! Order it from your grocer.

FELS-NAPTHA

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPTHA ODOR

EVER since she had awakened that spring morning, Marie Celeste had felt a curious, indescribable sensation of sadness. She had decided that it was the spring that was sad. The clear sharp sparkle of winter was gone. Instead, the air was like a soft sigh whispering over the bare fields; the trees were gaunt black skeletons; there was only a flicker of green in the hedges, and there was little warmth in the sunshine. Oh, it was surely the spring that was sad!

And it conveyed its sadness to her, who had so much reason to be gay. To be young, to be pretty, to be loved! Three good reasons to be glad. And she had finally made up her mind to tell Phillipe Baptiste that she would marry him in June. He had waited a long time for his answer, although she had known all along, as well as everyone else knew, that Phillipe Baptiste was the man that she would marry. It had always been intended so, as long as she could remember. But she had hung back from saying the final word. Once said, it was her honour pledged. She loved her freedom as the birds loved theirs. She liked things as they were; but older, graver minds said that the time had come for her to settle in life. She supposed that it were so. She could not remain always just Marie Celeste, care-free and gay, thoughtless of to-morrow. Life was not just a happy tune. It became serious as one grew older. She felt a slight tremor run through her when she thought of the importance of what she would tell Phillipe Baptiste that night at the country fair.

She had promised, however, that Joe should drive her to the fair. Poor Joe, with his twisted foot! He had so little fun at the fair which was the event of the year to the whole country-side. He could not join in the dances; he could only wander about, generally by himself, and watch the gayety of the others as they whirled about to the sound of the merry tunes.

Once she was there, she knew that Phillipe would claim her for every dance. He had such a way of pushing aside all the others who asked her to dance, of taking complete possession of her. She loved this forcefulness, this bold manner of courting, as she loved his eager black eyes and crisp curling hair.

She was still busy putting the last touches to her crisp pink muslin when she heard Joe's voice downstairs. It was a wonderful evening for a drive, but as she stood for a second at the open window before going downstairs, she felt again that same sensation of sadness as she looked out on the quiet fields, where the earth was changing to a dull red colour in the afterglow of the sunset.

With a feeling of impatience at her own stupidity, she ran downstairs, determined to enjoy herself. Seated behind the old plodding horse, with Joe talking in his quiet friendly tones, she felt more like herself again, the gay, happy Marie Celeste. The thought of the fair was exciting. She loved the crowd that would be there, the jostling friendly crowd, the ribbon decked booths, the merry music, the bags of pop corn, the tall glasses of pink lemonade.

"Oh, it is fun, the fair!" she exclaimed, "the dancing is so gay. I wish that you could dance, Joe."

He smiled contentedly. "I have my fun in watching the rest," he said. "One sees a lot looking on. I am glad that Phillipe will be there to dance with you. He's the best dancer in the whole country-side. So they say."

"Yes, he is," said Marie Celeste, glad to hear Phillipe praised, especially by Joe for she valued his opinion. "Do you like him, Joe?" she asked suddenly.

"Why, of course I like him," he responded. "I think he's a fine fellow. He's clever too. He'll be a rich man one of these days. He knows how to work as well as how to play. Phillipe Baptiste is all right."

Marie Celeste felt grateful to Joe. She knew all this herself, but she liked to hear Phillipe's praises sung. It was generous of Joe to be so enthusiastic, for he had every reason to know that Phillipe Baptiste was a rather serious rival in Marie Celeste's affections. She wondered if he would like him so well when he knew that she was to marry him in June. And then she was ashamed of thinking such a thing. Joe was not that kind. He would only be glad for her that she was marrying a man like Phillipe Baptiste. If there were any hurt to himself, Joe would keep it hidden. He would only have words of praise for his successful rival. She knew Joe. She could almost hear him saying in his slow tones. "Well, it's the best man wins." She had so often heard him say it over a game of cards.

Suddenly she made up her mind to tell Joe of her decision. She wanted to say it and have it over. She dreaded the idea that it would hurt him.

"I'm glad you like him," she said, "because.....oh, because.....I am going to tell him to-night.....that I will marry him in the summer."

Joe did not answer. He flapped the reins on the horse's back. The wheels sank into a puddle and Joe glanced over the side to see that they were not sinking too deep into the thick mud. Marie Celeste wished that he would say something. She felt nervously unhappy. She knew that she had hurt him. She twisted her hands together in her lap and wished that he would speak.

At length he cleared his throat and forced a smile into his grave eyes.

"That's news indeed, little Marie," he said, "big news. Phillipe Baptiste is a lucky man. And you are getting a good husband. He'll be a rich man someday, but what is better than that, I'm sure he'll make you happy."

Marie Celeste nodded her head.

"They have always intended me to marry him," she said. "And it is time now that I should be getting more serious."

was what she was wondering. She felt a lump come up in her throat. She could not do without Joe. Phillipe for her husband.....but Joe for her friend.....always.....always her friend.

"Yes, he will make me a good husband," she said at length, "but somehow, Joe, I don't feel very gay to-night. Life is not quite simple after all. It seems like this.....if you get one thing then something else is taken from you. Life hoards its gifts like a miser hoards his gold."

It is strange for you to talk like that, Marie Celeste," Joe said, "life has not been miserly to you."

"We can't live just in our own happiness," Marie said thoughtfully, "No matter how happy we are ourselves, if someone we care for is not happy.....then there is no happiness at all."

Joe was silent for a moment, with a furrowed brow.

"I suppose I know what you mean," he said, "but I want you to know, little Marie, that I would not have cared to see you married to a man with a twisted foot. I want better for you than that. Don't think of me as unhappy. What more can I ask than to look on at your happiness. It is like looking on at your dancing.....that is the same for me as though I danced. To see you happy.....then I am happy. Phillipe is a fine boy. I am content."

She put her hand gently on his rough sleeve.

and she clung to him desperately to regain her footing. She felt proud to be seen with him as they stepped off the platform for a few moments in the cooler air beyond. She turned in the direction of where they had left Joe, but he tried to urge her to go in the other direction.

"Oh, you don't want to go back there," he said, "Come off here where there aren't so many people."

But Marie Celeste shook her head and wondered at her own contrariness. She had come with the definite idea of giving Phillipe his answer, and yet now that the moment had come she longed to postpone it from one moment to the next.

"Let us look at the booths," she said, "they are so gay."

They strolled in and out of the crowd, and Marie Celeste knew that people cast glances at them both. Phillipe Baptiste always attracted attention; his loud laugh always made him conspicuous. As they came out of one of the tents she saw Joe passing. He looked tired, she thought, for he went slowly, and his foot seemed to drag more than usual. Something like a sharp little shaft seemed to pierce into her heart.

Phillipe Baptiste too saw Joe and he broke into a loud laugh.

"See, your lover with the twisted foot!" he said, and there was contempt in his tone. "What a gallant figure he makes at the fair. I'd stay at home if I looked like that."

Marie Celeste stood quite still. Her hands clenched at her sides; her eyes narrowed. She felt rigid, stiff with a sudden overwhelming sensation of passionate anger. She felt that she could have turned and struck Phillipe Baptiste with her little fists. She waited to speak until

"See your lover with the twisted foot," he said, and there was contempt in his tone. "What a gallant figure he makes at the fair. I'd stay at home if I looked like that."

Joe smiled and put his big hand over one of hers.

"Never grow serious, little Marie," he said, "there are plenty of serious people in this old world. Never forget how to laugh.....how to be gay. Never forget to be just Marie Celeste."

The tears started in Marie Celeste's eyes. What a miserable business it was to have to grow older and make these decisions. She sat back with her eyes fixed on the sky that was melting from primrose colour to a pale toneless shade. She could hear the crickets in the fields piping their curious shrill song. It seemed to pierce through her strangely. How unkind it was to have to hurt someone so good, so true as Joe. Joe had been her friend for so long. She had never thought of him as a lover, although she knew that he loved her. He had never said so, and she knew that he never would until some time, perhaps, when she had grown quite old and had ceased to care for dancing. Then, if she were not married.....then, she felt that he would come and ask her to share the remainder of his life. A husband with a twisted foot! Oh, she knew that he thought that that was no husband for Marie Celeste, who was so quick-footed, who loved so to dance and run and romp. Would he always be as much her friend as he was now? That

"Dear Joe," she said, "we will always be friends. Will we not? Good friends. Always."

Marie Celeste's spirits rose as they came close to the fair grounds. They could hear the music, the shouts and the laughter. Marie's little slippered feet beat in rhythm to the gay tunes. She was eager now to be out of the buggy and to be whirling round and round in the dance. A platform had been erected at the far end of the grounds and she could see the couples in the distance.

Phillipe Baptiste was on the look out for her and joined them almost the moment they entered the grounds. Marie's cheeks burned with excitement and her eyes shone as she stared around her at the slow moving crowds, the booths, the lights, the gayety. She wanted to penetrate into the mystery of a big tent, but Phillipe put her hand through his arm and led her away to the dancing pavilion.

It was thrilling to be there on the slippery boards with Phillipe's arm strongly held about her waist. He was whispering compliments to her as they whirled round and round. He looked very splendid, she thought, his eyes were so black, his teeth so white and shining. There was no one there who spun round with the same agility and grace. He swept her completely off her feet several times, the angry passion died and left her cold and contemptuous.

"Yes," she said, "It is true.....Joe has a twisted foot.....but it is you, Phillipe Baptiste.....it is you who have the twisted soul.....I am glad.....very glad, that you have shown it to me to-night."

In a flash she had left him and had crossed to where Joe was slowly making his way through the crowds. She slipped her hand through his arm and he turned to her in some surprise.

"I didn't expect to see you again," he said.

"Take me home, Joe," Marie Celeste said, "I don't like the fair. I like better to drive with you under the stars."

He frowned, puzzled, and looking up saw in the distance Phillipe Baptiste scowling as he watched them. Then with a shrug Phillipe turned and went into one of the tents.

Marie Celeste was very silent as they drove through the soft spring night. The air was like a caress on her burning cheeks. The stars were very bright and there was a smell of running sap and moist earth. At length she spoke.

"I have decided differently. I shall not marry Phillipe Baptiste."

"Why is that?" Joe asked.

THE IDOL of YOUTH

CN&AM WILLIAMSON

Illustrated by G. W. L. Bladen

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.

Captain Malet, a young officer returned from the war, is at Bournemouth with his Aunt Sarah when the beauty and distress of a young foreign guest at the hotel win his interest. In the guise of a waiter he makes her acquaintance, persuades an American millionaire, Henry S. Horden, to give him some caviare for the starving girl, and, before the evening is over, saves her from suicide and makes a friend of her dog, Petro. The girl is Patchinka Kapieha, a sister of the heroic aviator, Sacha Kapieha, who had lost his life in the war and whose plane is even then being offered as second prize in the lottery at Monte Carlo. Patchinka is taken to Mr. Horden, who had known her brother and who had wished to buy the aviator's secrets of invention. He adopts Patchinka as his niece and suggests that they should all go to Monte Carlo to buy the plane. In the meantime, Captain Malet is sent to buy a wardrobe for Miss Kapieha (known as Miss P. Smith) and is having difficulty explaining his needs to the saleswoman, "Miss Forty."

The latter (who is Miss Victoria Wellington) helps him effectively and becomes chaperon to Patchinka on the Monte Carlo expedition. They arrive and discover that three members of a syndicate, Mendez, Dupont and Moroni, are planning to secure the plane. Mr. Horden's wife (Dutch by birth) has been living at The Hague, but the daughter, Wendela, arrives at Monte Carlo, unknown to her father. The woman whom Sacha had loved, the Marguesa di Fiumine, who is unhappily married, is at Villa Persane near Monte Carlo. Wendela introduces a complication, becoming attached to the reluctant hero.

CHAPTER XX.

The Vision of the First Citron.

THERE was an old fairy story about a young prince, which used to be told me when I was small—before Aunt Sarah (who disapproved of fairy stories) took me over. It was a haunting little tale, and remained as an allegory in my mind while more practical lessons faded.

A fairy gave three citrons to the prince, as a reward for some knightly deed. "Take one, cut it, and see what happens," she advised him. "But above all, keep your head."

The prince cut one of the citrons, and to his astonishment a glorious girl—the girl of his dearest dreams—appeared. "Give me water to drink," she said with a bewitching smile. Alas, that smile was the Prince's undoing! He was so thrilled that he "sat like a mooncalf" (the story's words) and with a sigh the wondrous being vanished—gone forever, like a foam-wreath on a falling wave.

Of course, there were two citrons left; and though the silly princelet repeated the mooncalf act the second time, fortunately when it came to his last chance he had the water poured out in a jewelled glass. The third fair one drank and stayed. The pair were happy ever after as the hero and heroine of fairy stories invariably are. And that was that. But—was the third Vision as divine as the first would have been, had the Prince secured her? This question must have troubled his mind sometimes, during years of wedded joy.

I often thought of the story, as I grew up, in connection with my own life. And if I've been quick as a rule to seize opportunities, perhaps I owe it partly to that fairy legend. You see, I've always asked myself, "What if the first citron should be the best of the three?"

Patchinka Kapieha was for the ineffable Vision, and I was horribly afraid of not getting the drink of water for her in time, of spilling it out of the jewelled glass before I'd pressed it to her lips, or finding that the water wasn't after all the kind she liked to drink.

This was why I didn't close my eyes that night, after bringing Miss Horden back to the British Hotel as early as I decently could. Henry's daughter and I had won quite a pot of money; and in most circumstances that fact would have excited me a good deal; but in these, I scarcely thought of it. My mind teemed with questions, all concerning Patchinka.

Had I read her look aright, in the Casino, interpreting it, "Don't speak to us, Don't follow us."

Even if I had read aright, ought I to have obeyed?

Wouldn't she think a lot more of me if I'd shed Miss Horden on the spot, to pursue her and Miss Wellington.

Wouldn't she misunderstand my sticking to Wendela, and letting her go without a word or sign?

Those were the leading Tortures among the questions; but there were two more which prodded me with red-hot poker-jabs: why had Patchinka come over to Monte Carlo at night, when she'd mentioned no such intention? And—why had she and the Iron Duke laughed?

I don't think that sleepless night should be called a "White Night." If you have anything to worry about (and who hasn't)? It's as dark as a tomb where you're shut up alive. Thoughts that have been dressed in bright colours, or in grey, at worst, flock to you draped in black. They are menacing, merciless. You wonder that you ever saw them in any other aspect, and you feel that now at last you face them as they really are.

I cursed myself for letting Patchinka go. She was to me so unaccountable, so delicately mysterious, that it seemed quite probable I had lost my Vision of the Magic Citron forever, because I'd made some stupid blunder of conduct, which I was too dense to see in its true light. I shivered and sickened in fear lest, when I did get to Cap Martin with the morning, it might be to learn that Patchinka had disappeared.

Naturally I was up at dawn, though I saw sunrise only because it happened in the direction of Cap Martin while I hovered anxiously at the window, in pyjamas. All the same it was a sight. "Like a basket of red roses on a table of lapis lazuli," I couldn't help saying to myself as the ruby disc hung poised over the deep blue sea.

Beauty and fresh morning sweetness opened the doors of darkness in my brain, and hope flew in at the window. I splashed, shaved, dressed, and was ready for action before any conventional time to act; but after what I'd gone through I'd not have been made of man's flesh and blood if I could have kept to the programme Patchinka and I had mapped out for today.

Dining at the Pension Rossi we'd arranged to go early this morning to Nice and look up the school for flyers which used to exist.

"Early" meant starting at about nine from the Pension, where I was to call with a taxi. But now it was only 6.30. I couldn't wait two hours and give Patchinka time to elude me in case, somehow or other, in the Casino with Miss Horden and our wins, I'd forfeited her respect.

There was no one stirring in the hotel to give me coffee. At Monte Carlo, 6.30 a.m. is the dead middle of the night unless you have to catch a train: in which case you've given orders to be called. But I didn't care about coffee, I didn't even care about taxis. I went out from indoor dusk into pulsing, primrose light, and a street as empty as a street in a dream. I began to walk eastward, towards Cap Martin, but had got no further than the bridge dividing Monaco from France when a ram came along behind me. I jumped in with a few sleepy workmen, and rode on, on past Roquebrune as far as the first piney outposts of the Cap. As I threaded my way from one white road in the wood to another, I knew that I was on a fool's errand, because the window of Patchinka's room would give away no secret to my watching eyes. If she'd meant going, she'd probably have gone. If all were well, she'd be fast asleep; so I'd be no wiser either way. Of course, however, that argument didn't stop me for a moment. I marched past the Grand Hotel, and took the road we'd taken last night, which led to the rough lane of the Pension Rossi.

Now that full daylight azure the sky and lit the woods with gold and silver glints on pine and olive, the Villa Persane was clearly visible. We had stared from the taxi windows last night, but the dwelling had shown no lights, and was blotted out in darkness. Almost mechanically my quick steps slowed down, and I loitered past the long stretch of ivy-draped, pergola-like stone wall, gazing with a faint thrill at what seemed a house of mystery.

The villa stood far back from this barrier of reddish stone and bright green leaves, and surrounding it were many stone, pines dark, and tall, and umbrella shaped their level lines of sombre foliage striping with black the cream-white stone of the house. The building was suggestive of Persian pictures, and was somewhat fantastic in design, but somehow not gay. Behind it were more trees, but not enough to shut out a gorgeous view of sea, and of Monaco with the old stronghold of the Grimaldis and the Museum of the Prince. Among gnarled olive-trunks I caught glimpses of statues, and masses of colour which meant grouped flowers in a half-hidden garden. As I paused for an instant before the elaborate closed gate of old wrought iron, to my intense surprise the sound of singing floated to me with the sea breeze. It seemed very close. It seemed to come from the garden itself! And the voices—were they not familiar?

My heart gave a bump. Patchinka's plan!

She hadn't told me what it was. She had conceived it, hinted of it, dreamy eyed. But now it was as if I turned back to the page of a manuscript in cipher, and read it with a key I'd unexpectedly picked up.

Softly I whistled to myself—the air which the soprano and tenor voices were singing. I'd heard it before somewhere. Where? Oh yes, it was a thing that Patchinka hummed sometimes, just above her breath, when she was thinking hard. And the tune—if you could call it a tune—invariably had the weirdest effect upon Petro. Even if he were asleep he would start awake, and turn his big head wistfully as though seeking someone. Not till the faint lilting notes died would the dog lay himself down again, peculiarly depressed and flat.

"By Jove!" I thought, "I've come at the right moment after all." And I was wildly happy because my forebodings of the night were nothing but bad, waking dreams. Patchinka didn't hate me, or, anyhow, she hadn't gone.

Still, the situation was a delicate one. I mustn't in any way "butt in." If I did, I might do a great deal of harm. If Patchinka had wanted me to be "on in this scene" she would have cast me for some part in it. She hadn't; so the sooner I left the stage and scuttled into the wings, the better for me.

I stepped off the road; and walking delicately like Agag through the long grass under olives, I sat down at a distance, on a fallen log beneath silver branches. There were wild orchids in the grass, like little brown serpent-heads with open mouths; and there were masses of clover among which two four-leaved stalks started to my eyes, offering themselves to my hand. One for Patchinka and one for me, growing side by side! What a thrilling omen! I wouldn't have been not superstitious for the world.

For a long time I sat watching the tall, ornamental gates of the Villa Persane, and nothing happened except that the church clock in the hill village of Roquebrune struck the half hour after seven. Just sixty minutes since I left my room at the British Hotel!

During my watch under the tree the singer had poured forth one more song, very wild, very sad and very beautiful. Then silence fell and was not again broken.

A quarter to eight: eight. Still the gates remained shut. I grew restless, wondering if I ought to wait longer, or go to the Pension. I had got to my feet, unable to bear the suspense and sit still when the two Italians—Signor and Signora la Daga, tenor and soprano—appeared, not at the gate but hurrying along the road as if they had come from the hotel.

I bounded out of the woods and accosted them in French. Hadn't I heard them singing in the garden of the Villa Persane? And if so, how had they escaped without coming through the gate?

Ah, "escaped" was the word! panted the Signor, fat and scant of breath. That devil-doctor would have set a dog at them, if providentially la Petite hadn't taken with her the brave Petro. Petro had frightened the doctor's cur back into the house with its tail between its legs, so that—Signor and Signora—had walked out with decent dignity by the way they came—at least, they had walked till they reached the hole under the fence, where they had squatted down and squeezed themselves out. What fence? What hole? Oh, the fence at the back of the garden which ran down to the coast-guards' path along the cliff! The hole, made by heavy rain and a fall of stones. Mademoiselle had remembered the path and the fence, and hoped for a hole—or resolved at worst to create one. At dawn the three of them had gone exploring a great adventure, and they had been charmed to undertake it. Monsieur le Capitaine had doubtless planned the scheme with Mademoiselle last night?

When Monsieur le Capitaine confessed that he had not, the pair shut up. The affair was not their affair, except that they had been engaged for a princely sum by Mademoiselle to enter the garden of the Villa Persane as best they could before anyone was about, and sing there certain Polish songs suggested by her, which luckily they knew. Once the songs had been very popular during the war: words and music composed by a well-known airman, Sacha Kapieha.

Why Mademoiselle had chosen those songs, and why it had been worth her while to pay so much for such an adventure, she would be able to explain to Monsieur le Capitaine herself when she came.

"But when will she come?" I urged, as the pair betrayed gross impatience to get home to breakfast. "Where is she now?"

"We left her in the garden, talking to the lady—no doubt the Marquesa—who came out through a long window almost at once, when we began to sing," replied the Signora. "The doctor wished Mademoiselle to go with us. But Petro was there. And besides, the lady was holding her hand. We were no longer needed. Mademoiselle herself said that. But see, there she is at the gate! Someone—the lodge keeper—is opening it for her."

When I thought of the two again, they had gone. But by that time I was at the gate, and by the side of Patchinka. The vision of my first and only Magic Citron was safe, and within touch!

CHAPTER XX1.

"Loads and Loads of Essence."

PATCHINKA'S face had held possibilities of beauty before. Now it was beautiful, and radiant as the morn. Her head was bare, and her gorgeous hair hung down in two long plaits, making the girl look not a day older than fifteen.

"Success!" she cried. "Thanks partly to Petro. They've told you—the La Dagas?"

"Only that they sang—and a lady came out—and a doctor and a dog," I said, as we walked briskly away from the gate together, Petro at our heels.

Patchinka laughed excitedly. "Yes, they all came out, and then the dog went in. But you must somehow have guessed my plan that I wouldn't tell, or you'd not be here at eight o'clock?"

"I've been here since before seven," I explained. "But only because you came to the Casino last night—and laughed at me—and went off like—a witch on a broomstick. I was afraid you were annoyed at something. I couldn't bear to wait, so I—"

She looked up impishly. "What it is to be a man. Why should we be annoyed? We were oh, so amused. We had sent for the taxi and had gone to the Casino on purpose to be amused—in just that way. Besides—I too couldn't wait."

"Couldn't wait for what?"

"To see what Miss Horden was like. But now, no more of her. I can think only of Laurette. Mon ami, it was as I feared. She's been starved for music. It was part of a plot—a cruel plot. Now I know what we must do. We must save her. It may be difficult. But we must think hard, you and I."

"Is she sane? Have you found out that?" I asked.

"She isn't—normal. Except when she listens to music. That's why this wretch has kept it from her. But I will tell you all about everything as well as I can. You deserve to know, because it is you who suspected something wrong—you who would bring me to Cap Martin when I didn't wish to come."

And this, roughly, is the story of the adventure as Patchinka told it to me.

The "plan" had suddenly sprung into her mind when she heard the La Dagas sing, and learned that they needed engagements. Questioning the Rossi's about the habits of the household at the Villa Persane, she gathered that Doctor Silvestro (the second villain of the piece) was apparently a lazy man. He rose late in the mornings. He had no fear that Laurette would steal secretly away, because her maid was bidden (bribed) to take all her clothes out of the room each night. Well, a woman does not go for a walk without clothes! But Patchinka said to herself, "What would I do, if I heard someone sing, at dawn, music composed for me by the one man I'd ever loved? I would wrap myself in something, no matter what, and I would run instantly to see what the music meant. That was what Laurette did. She came out through a long French window on the ground floor, a satin bed-quilt over her dressing-gown, and her bare feet thrust into bedroom slippers. She recognised Patchinka and Petro, and cried with joy at sight of them.

roared that they were injuring his patient; threatened to have them arrested as trespassers; and demanded to know how they had got in.

It was Patchinka, of course, who answered. They had been out for an early walk on the coast-guards' path, and had found a hole under the fence. The dog had slipped through, and they had been obliged to follow in order to get him back. Once in, a good chance would have been wasted if they hadn't sung. Madame had come out, and had seemed pleased, that was all!

But Silvestro wasn't mollified, though it seemed as if his first suspicions were laid. His language in ordering the party to be gone was so—what Patchinka described as "extreme"—that La Daga took his wife by the arm and obeyed. Patchinka, however, stood her ground, backed up effectively by Petro. She used language too—oh, a very little, just a few things she had heard Sacha say when he was very angry indeed in Italian!—and refused to go except through the front gate. Laurette "Success," she cried, "thanks partly to Petro."

The one thing which showed that her clear senses were "jangled, out of tune" was her lack of curiosity. She didn't seem surprised at seeing Sacha's sister and his bulldog, nor to realise that years had passed since she saw them before. Perhaps the two long braids of dusty, copper-beech hair worn as the girl had worn them at fifteen, partly accounted for that state of mind, where Patchinka was concerned; and Petro had first made acquaintance with Laurette later than that Easter holiday. She did know however that Sacha had been killed. His beloved songs filled her with an agony of joy, lifted her heart and tore it out again.

She was very ill, she said, and very unhappy. But nothing mattered, now that Sacha was gone. Patchinka begged her to come away, but she shook her head. It wasn't worth while to bother. And just then, as the girl had carefully worked up to the subject of the papers and pearls, appeared Doctor Silvestro, half dressed, with an overcoat on and no collar. A dog too—a yapping yellow dog. But Petro looked at him and growled once, and he vanished.

The doctor stopped the singing, in a rage. He cursed in Italian, mistaking Patchinka, the bulldog, and the La Dagas all for one party of professional entertainers—just as the girl had hoped he might do if he were roused by the music and came out. He "called them names," had become a changed woman the moment the music stopped, and Patchinka was determined to watch her at any price. The Marquesa dropped down on a garden seat, the light of excitement dying from her eyes, leaving them listless and dull. She shivered, but commanded by Silvestro to return to the house, she did not seem even to hear.

The moment that permission was given Patchinka to pass through the front gate, however, and the girl moved as if to go, Laurette stumbled to her feet again.

"Goodbye, dear child," she said. "I can't remember just now who you are, but be sure you give him my love. Tell him I don't know anything about hearts, and I forgot about the papers. But I didn't forget the essence. No one else knows except Rousseau, but the essence is ready whenever it's needed—loads and loads of essence."

With that, the doctor took the poor lady by the hand, and led her to the open window, where by this time a sharp-faced, middle-aged maid stood waiting. Silvestro was quite gentle in his manner—perhaps out of deference to Petro—and Laurette made no resistance. She went in-doors meekly, and the window was shut. Then the doctor walked with Patchinka as far as the lodge, to give orders that the gate should be opened for her and the dog. He patronised her in rather a lordly way, treated her as a child, and catechised her thoroughly. What was her nationality? How had she happened to join a party of singers, and so on. She answered these questions, and the man seemed to have no suspicions concerning her. His great wish was that she should impress upon her companions one fact: Madame de Fiumine was hopelessly insane. The air raids in Paris had driven her mad. She could not now stand noise of any kind, even music.

"Hopeless is a strong word," I said, when Patchinka's story was finished. "But insane the poor creature does seem to be. I'm afraid she can't do anything to help us, even if we can do anything to help her, as she doesn't remember any 'papers or pearls'; and sending a message by you to 'him' looks as if she imagined your brother was still alive. That stuff about 'essence' loads and loads of essence, and 'Rousseau' sounds sheer nonsense—"

"Wait a minute!" Patchinka cut me short. "There may be more sense in that part than you think, Rousseau was the name of Laurette's chauffeur before the war, I remember, because she and Sacha called him always 'Jean Jacques' behind his back, for fun. I don't know what became of the man. I suppose he had to go as a soldier. Perhaps he's been killed. But there may have been a great secret about 'loads and loads of essence', and Rousseau may have been the only person in it except Laurette, himself—and Sacha. There was a scheme—I hardly know what—but I heard Sacha talk of it with her. Almost I thought they were joking, it sounded so romantic, so strange. Yet when she spoke just now of not forgetting the essence—'loads and loads of essence'—it all came back."

"What came back?" I ventured, when the girl's spirit seemed to float away on a dream.

"Oh, their talk, here in the woods—lovers' talk, Laurette was begging Sacha to fly to her sometimes, down in the South, where it was so quiet and sweet in Spring after the season crowds had gone, and no one could say cruel things about their love, things that were not true. Sacha kissed her hand, and said he would get a beautiful hydro aeroplane and name it 'Fair Dove'. He would start from somewhere up north, fly south, and alight in the sea just under her garden. Then he would take her far away with him, up into the sky, and not bring her back ever again unless she insisted. Laurette said she would hold him to his word, and she would spend her summers here, if he would come. She would tell 'Jean Jacques' to buy her thousands of gallons of Essence, and hide it for her in a safe, secret place she knew of, so they could fly together as far and as often as they liked. I thought it was just a pretty fantasy. But suppose Laurette was in earnest then? Suppose she wanted to make it possible for Sacha to fly to her really, and take her on wonderful sky journeys, without rousing gossip through having to buy essence—what you English call 'petrol', is it not? What if—"

"Great Scott!" I rapped out.

"And who is he—the great Scott?"

"A fellow you call on when you're surprised. I said just now that the Marquesa couldn't help us, even if we could help her. But may be she can. That is, if—"

"If?"

"If we get your brother's biplane."

"Oh!"

"And that reminds me—we ought have breakfast and start for Nice."

How heavenly it was to say "we" again!

CHAPTER XX1 I.

"The Divine Place."

THE Flying School still existed in Nice; or rather, it was restarting, managed by two of the old set, back from war. This was learned at a Cafe in the gay Avenue de la Gare, where we stopped, on the excuse of a sirop, to enquire. We were told, too, that the School was on the same ground as before, a mile or so outside Nice.

"We" were Patchinka, myself, and, of course, Petro. Miss Wellington, not sure of the rules which should govern the "Complait Chaperon" consented with moral reluctance and physical relief, to be left out of this expedition.

Skimming along the sea-front in a taxi, the girl was thoughtful, remembering—I was sure—her wonderful holiday week with Sacha. Silence between us was sweet to me, for I told myself that a girl must be feeling at home with a man when she doesn't "make conversation." Suddenly, however, she broke out. "There was a person here I liked so much. I think he was the head—what you call boss. His name was Gregoire Borisoff. He was of Russian birth. My Sacha was a god for him. It was Borisoff who trusted me with his own machine, a little old monoplane, that he'd flown in the Gordon-Bennett of 1913 at 100 miles an hour. He loved her dearly but he let me play with her because I was Sacha's sister. When I looped the loop all alone and came down safely, he seized me in his arms and kissed me on both cheeks—then apologised, though I was only a child. There was a Frenchman, too—his partner, much younger and more handsome. But I don't care to remember him. He was what you call 'cheeky,' though a person of good birth. If dear Borisoff is back, what shall I do? He may know me again—may find me like Sacha. How can I be for him Miss P. Smith?"

"You can't," I declared. "You'll have to take him into your confidence. He sounds the sort of chap you can trust."

We arrived at the flying-ground, an expanse of rough turf which looked vast to us, surrounded on three sides by shelters for different types of aeroplanes. Some of these shelters were flimsy hangars thrown together of old war-canvas and kept upright by spiderwebs of rope. Others were solid structures built of what the French call "briques," big, square slabs of red and yellow, domed with zinc, and provided with huge sliding doors. Here and there cone-shaped bags of silky material were placed, evidently to show beginners the direction of the wind, and help them avoid bad "take offs" or dangerous landings.

Awkward-looking planes were waddling like overgrown geese in or out of hangars. Others seem to have gone mad, like titanic hens with their heads cut off. These were taxiing about under their own power, lurching and lolling over the coarse grass and bald earth-patches, each with a couple of cursing mechanics hanging on behind as if to tame the wild thing by putting salt on its tail. Above our heads big birdlike shapes—still painted with their war colours—rushed and swooped, and deafeningly droned, diving so low now and then, as though out of malice, that I felt like jumping aside or ducking my head.

Suddenly there was a soft touch on my arm. Patchinka had slipped hers through it, in boyish chumminess born of sheer, impersonal ecstasy.

"O—oh! Isn't this a divine place?" she breathed, pressing herself against me, utterly without self-consciousness. "I—I'm almost happy again! And look at Petro. See how he smiles. Ah, we are at home, at last at home, he and I. And—and—yes, it is Monsieur Borisoff!"

The man she gazed at couldn't have heard. He was too far off, and the noise of every beast in Noah's Ark at dinner-time would have been faint beside the row overhead and underfoot. Yet mysteriously he started, and turned away from a fur-coated youth—a mild, depressed, helmeted youth, never meant by heaven to fly—whom he had been haranguing. He stared straight at us, focussing on Patchinka, and pushed a pair of goggles further up on the top of his head, where they reared like the hood of an adder. His round, red face lit like the sun when a fog rolls away. At first glance I'd thought him old for a flying man, but he showed his white teeth in an immense grin, and looked younger than any boy would condescend to look.

"Mon Dieu, it is she—the Only One!" he shrieked in French, bounding towards us with a gesture that embraced a respectful circle of surrounding Patchinka. "My little Lady of the Air—my young sky goddess! And she is married and this is her husband."

The two were shaking hands as if they'd never stop, and the short, square figure in the goatskin coat gave little joyous leaps off the ground as if he were a human helicopter able to leave the earth without a "take off." Tears the size of pigeon's eggs popped out of prominent blue eyes and jumped off hard red cheeks as hail stones jump off rocks. Patchinka was crying too, and with an ounce of encouragement would have sobbed on a furry, farm-scented shoulder, I envied Borisoff, but less actively than if the girl had been in haste to deny me as her husband.

It was not until they'd mingled their grief over Sacha, revived old times, discussed the war, and Gregorie Borisoff had remembered my existence with an apologetic glance, that Patchinka explained me away.

"Oh, I forget. I'm not married," she said. "This is my friend Captain Malet who saved Petro's life and mine in England (you remember Petro, when you met Sacha in Paris?) and I'm calling myself Miss P. Smith at present; but we will tell you everything. And Captain Malet has to be taught to fly in a great hurry. So much depends on that, for us."

Borisoff gazed on me as if I'd been a strange, though not wholly unpleasant species of animal. "Monsieur le Capitaine cannot fly?" he exclaimed. Had I been born without nose, mouth or eyes, it could hardly have struck him as more remarkable, more pitiable.

"Captain Malet was doing other things in the war, big things, and was decorated for doing them," the girl defended me. "Tanks for instance. He commanded a tank in Russia, and could drive it if he wished as well as you can drive a biplane."

"In Russia. A tank in Russia. Mon Dieu," Borisoff marvelled at me. "That tour of my face. It seemed long as well as stiff, and of a consistency to knock off with a hammer. I prayed that Patchinka mightn't notice any change in my features!

If she did, she made no comment, but was all eagerness to begin the business of the day. When Borisoff had been taken into our confidence and pledged to help carry out our plans, there was no service we could have asked of him in vain.

"You remember 'le Beau Sabreur,' as we used to call him?" the little man enquired, on a sudden thought.

Patchinka flushed faintly. "Oh, yes! He exists still?"

"Indeed he exists. He is my partner here as before, though he was wounded in the war and limps a little with one foot. He is just coming down now, with a pupil."

"Le Beau Sabreur" is Monsieur Louis Gauthier," the girl explained to me. "The nickname is because he is handsome, and because he used to be a famous amateur fencer before the war. He and Sacha tried the foils together sometimes and,— tints in the green-grey eyes, darkened lashes and brows, and burnished the copper-beech of Patchinka's hair. But she was quite grave. No show of dimples, as for Borisoff.

Never was man more palpitatingly male than this dark Gauthier when he greeted Patchinka, kissing first one small grey glove, then the other. Slowly she drew her hands from his clasp with dignity, but not with anger. If there had been things she wished to forget, she intended also to forgive.

"Welcome—you are welcome as spring sunshine after storm, Mademoiselle!" he exclaimed. "It is Mademoiselle, still?" he added quietly, with a glance prepared to pierce my grey matter if I had established a claim upon the girl.

"Oh, yes, Mademoiselle still, though incognita at present for reasons," Borisoff explained for her. "Le Monsieur Anglais here is le Capitaine Malet, a friend, a helper; for Mademoiselle has come south on a mission."

The fact that I was a "friend, a helper" did me little good with Gauthier, I saw, though he turned as soon as he politely could, to fling himself heart and soul into talk with Sacha Kapieha's sister, the little "goddess of the sky."

She heard with interest what had happened to him, and let Borisoff explain what had happened to her; how she had been too late to claim Sacha's mascot, and soon. Into the tale of her English adventures my name entered now and then: whereupon I felt the atmosphere between Gauthier and me become electrical.

"We will all, of course, help Mademoiselle to obtain her brother's Machine, which should be hers by right," he said. "Monsieur le Capitaine Malet shall not be her only champion. Who knows what we, her old friends, can do? And one small favour I claim for myself, to begin with. No, not from you, Mademoiselle; from le Capitaine Malet."

"Only too pleased," I answered, embarrassed.

"Good! I hold you to your word. It is, that I shall be your instructor—I, the one to teach you to fly—and that Mademoiselle shall watch."

CHAPTER XXIII.

The Secret Name.

PATCHINKA'S long eyes opened uncommonly wide. Her lips parted, but she did not speak, she merely looked from Gauthier to me, and then in appeal to Borisoff.

Gauthier smiled charmingly: "Have no fears, chere Mademoiselle," he soothed her. "Ask old Gregoire, if I am not a skilled teacher."

"He is even better than I, if possible," Borisoff assured the girl, with engaging conceit. "It is a compliment that he asks to teach le Capitaine Malet."

"I hope Monsieur le Capitaine takes it as such," said Gauthier. His handsome eyes questioned mine in gay defiance.

"I do!" said I, accepting the challenge, and giving look for look. It was true; I did take it as a compliment that he wanted to teach me. He wanted to do it because he was jealous, and it was a feather in my cap that one of the handsomest men ever born should be jealous of me. It made me think better of myself. And that look of his sent no melodramatic shudder down my spine. He didn't intend to kill and make a martyr of me, thus presenting Patchinka with a grudge against him and my memory to mourn. He had formed a plan, but not a blood-thirsty plan. The spine wasn't where his look affected me. It was just under the waistcoat. He hoped to make me funk before our goddess, and I wasn't sure that he might not find some way of succeeding. I said that I should not like flying under the auspices of Louis Gauthier, le Beau Sabreur of Nice. But it had to be done, and I might as well get on with it.

"So you are in a hurry to begin?" he prompted me.

I said that this was true. "We must first try him with some of the tests, n'est-ce pas, Borisoff and Mademoiselle, to see what sort of flier he will make," Gauthier proposed.

Borisoff agreed. Patchinka was silent. But I saw in her eyes that she knew what they meant, and by the biting of her lip that she wished she had warned me befor my idea, is beyond all. I would not have courage to enter a tank, me. No, the very thought makes me weak in the middle, as if the whale of Jonah were about to swallow me?"

I laughed, and so did Patchinka, drying her eyes. But my laugh wasn't, perhaps, as spontaneous as hers. She was as much at home in the air and at incredible heights as Borisoff was; more at home at home than on earth, while I—well, I must admit that the sight of these aeroplanes behaving like giant grasshoppers on earth and Brobdingnag hats in the air, were making me feel slightly seasick in advance. Aeroplanes in the abstract appealed to the romance in me. But bumping about under my nose and roaring over my head, I found that it was my stomach rather than my mind that they influenced. I saw myself, in imagination, turning turtle in the sky as several pupils of the school were gaily doing, and—well, honestly I don't think I was frightened, but the prospect wasn't as delicious as from distance.

I kept a stiff upper lip, however, though I felt it was far from becoming to the conhe offered to teach me, and I did take one lesson."

Why that blush of hers? I wondered. But when a biplane (of moderate size in the sky, yet formidable as a Pterodactyl when landing) had disgorged a tall, graceful figure in leather coat and helmet, it was easy to guess the reason.

The machine was left to mechanics, and the pupil who had been up was abandoned without ceremony. A gesture from Borisoff, and an instinct of his own brought the instructor to us with swift strides. The goggles were pushed back and as handsome a face as I had ever seen on man was revealed. The glow of the dark, Latin eyes, gave away their secret at once. Not only did le Beau Sabreur recognise Patchinka, but he had been in love with her. He was ready to fall in love again, too, if ever he had fallen out.

"Monsieur Gauthier!" the girl murmured—didn't shout with frank pleasure as she'd shouted the name of Borisoff. The deep rose of her cheeks (already rounder than when she starved at the Bourne-mouth Haven) made her a bewitching beauty. The colour brought out beryl

LE Verandrye, the Frenchman who came up the Red river in 1731 and built a fort at Winnipeg, pressed farther on. His route at last was by way of the north Saskatchewan river. The fur trade was his lure, and those low wooded hills lying to the east of the river were called by the Indians the Beaver Hills. Le Verandrye had come a thousand miles since he left the gateway of the West—a thousand miles over the Prairies, a thousand miles of long undulating beflowered grass, of bleak desert, of snow filled plain. And then this oasis of rivered green. He must have seen the dream it contained unroll before him.

The next recorded recognition of a wonderful site came in 1778, when the Nor' West Company, rivals of the Hudson's Bay, founded Fort des Prairies. In enormous isolation it stood on the bank of the river and when the union of the two fur Companies came to pass, and the Hudson's Bay took command about 1809 the Fort was renamed Edmonton because of the affection of the trader in charge for his suburban abode on the outskirts of London.

It was a picturesque period, that of the Old Fort and its inmates. There was a high wooden stockade with four block-houses on the corners and two small brass cannon. Within it stood a flour mill, and carpenter, boatbuilding, blacksmith and harness shops. It was indeed a tiny walled city. The buildings were much crowded, there being only narrow alleyways between. A Court and yet a Community, it held within its limited area all the elements that make British rule the world over. It was self-contained and splendidly poised on the edge of a world in the making. All around the wooden walls dwelt the great unknown: natural elements vast in power; Indians insistent and inscrutable; herds of buffalo that then seemed numberless.

From the records of those days it will be seen that the first fort of 1796 was built on the lower level of the meadow, home of the present Power Plant of Edmonton. After seventeen years it was washed away by flood. The second fort was built on the high ground where the Parliament Buildings now stand. It was under the command of a chief Factor who kept up the traditions and wore a cocked hat and a bejeweled sword. The men who commanded the garrison were usually Scots, and were signed on for service as in the army or navy. Indeed a separate history could be written about these Factors who ruled the western forts for a good fifty years. They possessed great loyalty, energy and fearlessness.

There was a Canadian artist, one Paul Kane, who made the first sketching trip over the prairies in 1847. He spent a winter at Edmonton, which had then become a great food producing centre. Within the walls of the fort the inhabitants now numbered over one hundred and fifty. Kane says they lived in "luxury and fashion." His diary gives a fascinating account of the times. He is of course deeply interested in the Indians. "Eleven of the most important and war-like tribes" he says "were in constant communication with the fort. Crees and Assiniboines lived in the country, while at least twice a year Blackfeet, Sarcees, Peigans and Bloods from southern Alberta traded at Edmonton their dried meat and fat."

We hear of a great feast and dance at the Factor's House in the fort on Christmas night 1848. To the dance some Indians were invited. The music was made by a violin in combination with the Indian drumsticks. The dance was a medley of Highland reels, strathspeys and hornpipes and the wild pageantry of the Indian ritualistic dances. Among the motley colors and barbaric excitement of the liquor-fed music-mad crowd, the artist, Kane, espied a young Cree so lovely that he afterwards immortalized her on canvas.

"Her poetic name was Con-ne-wah-bam," says the artist; "it means 'one who looks at the stars.' She sat for her likeness with greatest patience, holding her fan which was made of the tip of a swan's wing, with a handle of porcupine quills, in a most coquettish manner."

Kane tells us also that the sequel to the festivity of this Christmas week was the wedding at New Year of John Rowand jr., in charge of Fort Pitt, and Miss Herriot, the daughter of the chief Factor. The wedding trip down the ice two hundred miles to Fort Pitt was made by sledge. Three Carioles and four sledges with four dogs to each formed the cavalcade. Nine men, including Kane, were the body guard. The dogs were decked in bright-colored saddle cloths, fantastically embroidered, feathered, and covered with innumerable tiny bells. No provisions were taken, for the party went ahead, killed the buffalo and prepared it, made the camp, lit the great fires in the snow and slung the wigwam for the bride and groom. Battles with the wolf-packs, violence, and sudden death and the glory of sunbathed untracked spaces—only seventy-five years ago.

After the Factors, and following in the wake of the H. B. C., came the independent fur trader, the prospector and the boot-legger. The escapades of these gentlemen drew the attention of the Dominion Government to the need of police protection in the west; and so came the formation of the Royal North West Mounted Police in 1874, and the next step in civilization.

JUNE Somers curled herself up in a wicker chair one sunny August morning and smiled across the verandah at her very dignified Aunt, "Of course I shall not withdraw, Auntie," there was a defiant little tilt to her chin. "It's too late to change my mind, even if I wanted to—and I don't!"

"But June, Muskoka in winter! It's preposterous! I never for a moment dreamed you were serious about teaching in a rural school!"

"But you know how I love kiddies, Auntie, and I don't want to teach in the city. Ever since I saw that little red school at Port Pinefield I made up my mind to apply for it." June smiled, "I'll come back next summer a prim, little, back-woods school-marm! Oh please, Auntie!"

There was no resisting June's smile. Mrs. Somers hesitated, then reluctantly accepted the inevitable.

After all, there was nothing else to do.

It was a soft September day when June arrived at her Muskoka destination. "I feel as if I'd slipped back a hundred years, and was a real pioneer," she thought, as she carried on a disjointed conversation with her farmer-host, Mr. Weston, between the bumps and lurches of the creaky little buggy.

In a large bare house over-looking the lake June's hostess welcomed her, "I'm so glad she's a billowy, comfortable-looking person, they're always kind!" June thought appreciatively.

There were three daughters. Belinda, Martha, and Biddy; bright, buxom girls who subjected June to a somewhat embarrassing stare during supper. June, with keen intuition, was conscious that those stares were partly curious and wholly admiring. It was the youngest—a girl of eighteen or so—who took her hand later in the evening and asked timidly, "Is it all yours, Miss Somers,—your hair, I mean?"

June laughed at the incredulous face of the young girl, "Well rather!" she said.

On Monday morning Mr. Weston accompanied June to the little school-house. Of a dull, soft red it stood back from the Government Road. "In a little while those woods will be beautiful," Mr. Weston said, "them' maples, in particular."

"Yes," June thought, with a glance upward at the soft amber-green of the trees, "I have a feeling that one might become very fond of those maples!"

Half an hour later she faced her new pupils, fourteen of them, squirming and giggling, obviously excited over the arrival of a new teacher. "Are there usually fourteen?" June asked, after roll-call.

"You bet there ain't," a small boy, who had answered to the name of Bobby Reid, volunteered eagerly, "we just came to see what you looked like."

June was tired when she walked towards her new lodging that afternoon. Overhead the tall elms swayed and rustled, "I could never be too tired to enjoy this," she thought, "It will be lovely to have these walks alone after the noise and fuss of the school-room. Oh!"

A small sticky hand slipped unexpectedly into hers. "I'm Molly McCoombe," the owner of the hand explained. "Do you know what a crush is? Well, I've got one on you!"

June soon found that she was not to enjoy those walks alone. To be allowed to walk home with Miss Somers became a privilege which was eagerly sought. During the last session of the afternoon the children would concentrate with suspicious and glowing attention on troublesome dates and unwieldy sums, sucking their pencils with audible zest, "For p'raps, she'll see how awfully hard I'm workin', and I'll say it's my turn."

After dismissing her body-guard at the gate June would invariably find Mrs. Weston comfortably rocking on the verandah—good-naturedly garrulous. Escaping to her own room she would be followed by Belinda, or Martha, or Biddy, "For we mustn't let the poor dear feel lonely," they said. "Oh dear!" June thought, "I wish to goodness they would!"

Early Sunday evening at the end of her first week's work she slipped away to a rocky point and sat down gratefully on a soft bed of pine-needles. It was very still. The only sound that came over the quiet waters was the bell of the little Church across the bay, clear, soft, sweetly mellow. "Oh my, it's wonderful!" June whispered, with an exultant thrill in her voice, "Just to be alone like this—all by myself!"

JUNE SOMERS

The voice of Biddy Weston,—flat, cheerfully confident—suddenly made itself heard. "Oh Miss Somers, I thought I'd find you here. I do so want to have a talk. You don't mind, do you?"

June parried the question, "You have something to tell me, Biddy, I can see by your eyes!"

Biddy had. With hysterical little gasps she related how Silas Moore had asked her—little Biddy Weston—to go buggy riding next Wednesday, and how she had said, "Oh Joy!" "Should I have done that, Miss Somers?" she asked anxiously.

"Just be natural, Biddy dear," June said gently, "If he's the right sort he'll like you just because you are you!"

The days passed quickly after that first week. Mellow, sunshiny October days which slipped by almost imperceptibly. In the woods all traces of summer had vanished. Only the pines and cedars retained their green, and stood, like dark slender sentinels, in sharp relief against the flaming red and gold of the maples.

It was in October that June met Jim Beaumont. She saw him first when little Bobby Reid was convoying her home one afternoon, "Hello," Jim Beaumont said to Bobby, looking at June.

"Hello!" Bobby said, "That's the parson man of our church," he answered June's unspoken question, "Say, he can preach like Sam Hill, but all the same he's a swell guy!"

A JUNE DAY

by

L. M. Montgomery

Come, 'tis a day that was born for dreaming,

A day in June for adventurers!

We will have done with worry and scheming

Here, where a west wind purrs;

We will forget we are tired and old,

We will forget our plots for gold,

We will just remember the little wild rose,

And the lure of a cloud that comes and goes.

We will just remember the nested meadow,

And the wonderful peace of the high blue skies,

The leaves' green flicker, the wood-fern's shadow,

The moths and the butterflies;

We will drive out fear and take hope instead,

We will wander just where our feet are led,

Taking no heed for roof or bar,

Till we keep an old tryst with the evening star.

Good-bye for a day to the bitter striving,

The fret and corrosion of desk and mart,

Ours will be gypsy honey for hiving,

And ours the childhood heart;

Ours to loiter by brooks impearled

As if there were never a clock in the world,

Ours to march with the windy fir—

We are June-time adventurers!

Two evenings later Biddy Weston knocked at June's door, "Come down, Miss Somers," she whispered excitedly, "The Minister's calling, you must come down. He's not a bit like one, really!" she added reassuringly.

"I'll come to the little school-house and see your method of teaching," Jim told June at the end of that evening's call.

"If you do," June retorted, "I'll come and hear you preach!"

The Rev. James Beaumont walked back to his boarding-house after that call with a pleasant little glow in the vicinity of his heart. "June Somers! June Somers!" he repeated, "What a pretty name! But why in the world does a girl like that want to teach up here!"

Jim Beaumont, after his ordination, had gone overseas in a fighting unit. He had returned with a weak lung and had spent long weary months in the Sanatorium. For the last year he had taken one service a week at the tiny Presbyterian Church at Port Pinefield, and now his lung was pronounced completely cured. At present he was finishing his term with irritable impatience. "It's just waste time, knocking around here," he often said to himself.

A day or two later he appeared at the little red school-house. "Thought it might be near breaking-up time," he said cheerfully, "so perhaps we could walk around the Bay together."

"Oh, but I can't to-day," June said quickly in her frank young voice, "You see they all have turns, and to-day it's Molly's, and tomorrow Bill's, but perhaps—how about next Tuesday?"

So Jim, rather huffily, took himself off—alone.

BUT on Tuesday they set out together. At first June was rather shy and self-conscious. This big boy by her side was very different from one of the usual little fellows who would tuck his hand confidently into hers and say, "Gee, Miss Somers, I'm glad it's my turn!" But the constraint wore off, and they arrived glowing and laughing at the Westons. "Oh my," Biddy Weston whispered fiercely to herself, "Oh my, that's what, eh?"

After that Jim's turn came as regularly as clockwork each week. Sometimes June went to his little Church and then, after the service, he would walk home with her around the Bay. It was during one of these Sunday night walks that she learned of his discontent with his present work. "I'm only marking time," he explained, "I'm leaving at the end of my year. It's no man's job, this, with two or three families—"

"Oh surely—"

"Well," he admitted, "a few more, but—"

"Two or three gathered together," June said, half under her breath. Then suddenly she faced him with her gray eyes flashing, "I think that's a terrible way to look at it. You have tremendous opportunities of doing a big work here. In an outlying district people have so little to interest them,—why, those kiddies of mine—"

"Oh well, you—"

"You too, if you'd get to work and didn't think everything began and ended with that one little service Sunday evenings. You could be a tremendous factor here if you would. I'd far rather be a potter here with this clay to work, than handle the—the cement in the city!"

And that night the Rev. James Beaumont walked home with something more than a pair of gray eyes to think about.

It was an open Fall. The sunshine of October was succeeded by dull gray November skies when a great quiet seemed to rest over the woods, a hushed expectancy of the Spirit of Winter.

Three weeks before Christmas came the first heavy snow-fall. After a night of tearing storm the earth stood forth, white and dazzling under the deep, clear vault of blue. June danced excitedly from one foot to the other in the dining-room window, "Oh those trees! They're lovelier than anything I ever imagined. I do hope it lasts!"

"It will," Mr. Weston told her, "the pine branches are holding the snow, see? If it fell through we'd know it wouldn't last no time at all!"

That morning June, to her intense satisfaction, tramped to school on snowshoes. "What a ripping thing to write home," she thought with delighted little giggles.

These pleasing reflections were broken by the appearance of Bobby Reid wading through the drifts. "Just thought I'd come and help you along," he said, manfully trying to suppress the puffs which the effort had cost him. It was evident that Bobby had something on his mind. "See here, Miss Somers," he said at last, "you know about that Red Ridin' Hood thing you're havin' us do for our Christmas party?"

June nodded.

"Well, us fellows are a bit mad, because, you see, Red Ridin' Hood's a girl, and the Grandmother's a girl, and us fellows ain't nothin' at all!"

"That is an omission," June agreed quickly, to his evident relief, although he hadn't the vaguest idea what 'omission' meant. "How would it be," June said slowly, "if I let one of you be the wolf? We could use a fur coat—"

"Gosh!" Bobby was frankly staggered. "Oh that'd be swell!" He plunged from a drift, his face scarlet with something more than exercise. "I say, Miss Somers, could I be HIM—THE WOLF?"

Sometimes during the week or two previous to the entertainment June wondered if she had been wise to introduce the children to the intoxicating excitement of acting. They had given entertainments before, but never in the history of the little red school-house had they really and truly acted a story. Excitement ran high. Bobby Reid, envied of all, daily practised "bein' a wolf" in the big farm kitchen. He would emerge hot and sticky. "It ain't no fun practisin'," he confessed, "but I'll be the real thing all right!"

On the night of the great event proud parents filled the little school-house, applauding vigorously the muffled utterances of the small performers and then settling into a comfortable hush of expectancy when Red Riding Hood appeared, and Farmer Reid's fur coat waddled majestically across the platform. For awhile all went well. Then Red Riding Hood, catching sight of her mother in the audience, fixed her with a glassy stare and forgot her "lines." There was a tense and paralyzing silence until suddenly the wolf reared indignantly on his hind legs, "Say something, you duffer," he shouted wrathfully, at which the audience rocked with laughter, and Bobby tumbled to all fours blushing furiously with mortification inside the fur coat.

It was late that night when Jim Beaumont accompanied June around the Bay. "Have you really enjoyed this all so much?" he asked her curiously.

"I loved it," the girl said simply. "I might be doing something more exciting in Toronto, but oh, those kiddies! Look!" she added suddenly, with a touch of awe in her voice, "The stars, aren't they wonderful? Why down in Toronto they seem few and remote, don't they? Here I feel as if I could pull one right down. I love to think of the stars, as someone has called them, 'the forget-me-nots of the Angels.'"

"So do I!" Jim agreed, looking down into June's gray eyes.

It was a white Christmas. Far over the rocks and fields, and through the woods, as far as eye could see, stretched a snowy carpet, sparkling under the winter sun, or a cold, dead white against the dulness of a gray sky.

By the middle of January the lakes were frozen over. June was rather disappointed. "They're snowy, I thought they'd look sort of transparent, like a rink," she said, to Farmer Weston's amusement.

There were nipped fingers to thaw in the little school-house those mornings, and it was hard to hold attention. Sometimes June would gather all around the stove and tell stories of other children in far-away China or Russia, and the contrast between those small foreigners and themselves would be so sharply defined and the description so vividly realistic, that they would leave the little school-house assuring each other that, even if it was "bloomin' cold" they'd rather go to school in the Canadian woods than anywhere else in the wide, wide world.

There was something attractively cosy about those long winter evenings at the Weston farm when, the ugly oil lamps extinguished, great logs and cedar boughs would blaze and crackle in the wide new fireplace, throwing into soft relief the rather garish purples and reds of the furnishings.

"We've always hated the winter nights," Biddy Weston told June, "but since you got the piano going and started those lovely games round the fire, why, it just seems as warm and nice as—as Heaven to me!"

But there was another factor that was making it seem like Heaven to little Biddy Weston. She told June "all about it" one night. "Oh Miss Somers, I just wanted you to know," she whispered, her face rosy and beaming with happiness, "He asked me to-night if I'd marry him, and—and he said did I love him at all? All of a heap I remembered what you'd said, Miss Somers, just to be natural, so I looked him square in the eye and said, 'You bet I do, Silas Moore!'"

Sometimes Jim Beaumont would drive over and take June a long swift cutter ride down the Government Road toward Bud-haven. "It's glorious!" the girl said one night, burying her chin deep in her soft fur collar.

"Isn't it fine!" he agreed quickly. "You know, Miss Somers," he went on, "I really owe you a debt of gratitude, for that little—er—lecture of yours jogged me out of a very sticky little rut. I was merely marking time, not giving the work here a fair chance at all. But lately I have seen the need for a great deal of energy and hard work. Now I'm wondering how in the world I'll ever get through by April!"

"Is—that when you leave?"

"Yes. I'll not take anything definite until next Fall. This has been good experience. I only wish I'd 'dug in' sooner. But I still feel that an older man could take charge, the people want the work done, but they don't particularly want me."

"Then if they don't," June said, in rather a fierce little whisper, "I'd make them!"

FEBRUARY brought more snow. Day after day it fell from heavy leaden skies and piled into high, almost insurmountable drifts over the country-side. By the end of the month and during March the raw dampness penetrated the school-room causing a curious depressing effect on all. Teaching was increasingly difficult. Over straight history or geography lessons the class interest would flag, sighs and yawns become audibly contagious through the heavy atmosphere. June would resort to story-telling, and in that she found the key to the romance-starved heart of every child. "Gosh, that's swell!" Bobby Reid told her one afternoon, after listening to the story of Sir Richard Grenville.

"I like the one about that King best," Molly McCoombe said, "the one that had all them six wives. Has our King only one, Miss Somers?" Molly was disappointed to hear that in this enlightened age this great opportunity was beyond the grasp of even the King of England.

And then when winter was over and Spring was communicating itself to June in intoxicating little whiffs, Jim Beaumont came across to say good-bye. "I'm leaving tomorrow," he said abruptly.

"Oh!" June said.

"I'm going to write, and I'll see you again in Toronto?"

"Perhaps!"

"But I will. It's—it's unthinkable that I shouldn't."

"I'm sorry you're going," June said, "we'll all miss you."

Jim thought over those words as he tramped around the Bay. Was she really sorry? Was it merely a polite assertion? Or was there a deeper meaning underlying her words?

At that moment June was facing an accusing reflection in her small wriggly mirror, "I wonder," she addressed that reflection severely, "whether you would rather spend another year here with those kiddies of yours—and not see Jim Beaumont at all! Or whether you'd leave them all and go back to—Toronto!"

The mirror gave back no answer. June turned away. She propped up her window, grateful for the fresh, cool air on her hot cheeks. "The new teacher might be horrid," she thought, "or she might be nice and yet not love them like I do. Or she might be very nice, nicer than I, and they might love her more! No! I have a feeling 'way down in my heart Jim Beaumont, that I'd like to stay right here!"

About a month after Jim's departure Biddy Weston met June one afternoon at the gate. Biddy was obviously excited, "Oh Miss Somers," she gasped, "The Board—of our Church, you know—have written asking Mr. Beaumont to come back—to come back to stay! Oh, he's got to come, so we're signing a letter telling him how much we all want him. You've got to sign it too, Miss Somers. I kind of think he will come because—because I'm slipping in a little note to tell him if he comes back in the Fall, Silas an' I are willing to wait till then to be married, so he'll be here to do it!" It was evident that the girl thought this would prove an irresistible magnet which would draw the Rev. James Beaumont straight back into the Parish of Pinefield.

"See here," he said quickly to the children, "here's a quarter for each of you. Now, you both run to Pinefield and buy something—anything—I don't care what."

The Lure of Quebec

BY WILLIAM LUTTON

The centre of Quebec. The public square in front of the Basilica. This is the Cardinal's church, and hanging therein is the red hat of Cardinal Begin.

THE traveller took off his hat and remarked to his guide, "The centuries are looking down upon the Plains of Abraham."

"That is all very well" replied the guide, "but have you seen our new organ?"

The marriage of the practical with the ideal has been accomplished in Quebec in a very notable way. For many years it was the classics and scholastic culture, and a certain aloofness from the interests of the general public, because Virgilis never was interested in a place of wheat, but in time the economic pressure became so great that a rushing world, sometimes delirious, had to be taken account of.

There were capital, men of brains and an immense opportunity which has at least been measurably availed of, and to-day while we have austere seats of learning, and a delicate spirit which would fain shrink from unlovely contacts, there is at the same time the energetic operation of the Zeitgeist which means that the trolleys are in Quebec, that the big liners of the C. P. R. dock at the wharves, that swarthy men from all parts of the world can be seen in the summertime working for dear life among freight which has traversed every sea, huge fellows who have that tarry smell, which indicates the genuine sailor. Other things followed, the introduction of American capital, the harnessing of waterways, the new interest in education, technical and practical in their bent.

Perhaps the Quebec of romance did not like it very well, because all this in operation might wake the baby at night, but this is a remarkable thing, that not all at once, but surely if slowly, Quebec put the marriage ring upon the finger of Horace. That is why, if you come to think of it, that the C. P. R. is putting up a monument to Abraham Martin, the first Pilot in Canada on the historic plains named after him. It is the combination of the practical with the ideal in such natures as Martin's that bring about the great things of the world.

Quebec is having a new birth. The big industries of the world are being copied by Quebec, but at the same time the mistress of romance does not abate one jot of her claim to be the great spiritual figure of the continent. She encourages the machine factory, but Cicero she holds out to her classic of youth. She is thankful for the trolley car that would take her up break neck steps, which nevertheless, expresses something which the trolley car cannot offer, namely, poetry. But whether drudgingly or willingly, Quebec is now in this remarkable position. In many regards she is the mistress of modern industry, but at the same time expresses the spiritual feeling which has kept Quebec loyal to its early faith, which early faith, according to M. Briand, has been salvation as proving the operation of a soul in the nation.

"Sown in the wrinkles of the monstrous hills the city looked like a grain of salt." One might not inaptly apply this to Quebec, encircled as it is by the Laurentian Mountains. This is particularly the case at night, when the city from riverside basement to hill-top garret quivers with innumerable points of flame. The little islets in the river offer in the summertime their votive illumination. The city, itself, poised upon the rock with an exquisite delicacy expresses all there is of beauty in varied form, and spiritual aspiration, while the cluster of churches, including the Chateau on the Terrace, show very significantly how the spiritual and material find it convenient to marry. In the latter great family circle one hears the throbbing of Strauss' Blue Danube, there is a whirl of flying figures, young enough, and beautiful enough to defy all the flocks of time. There is a world in and around the Chateau, which has to shed its first tear, this is the elysium of youth. This kind of joy leaves no headache, and Quebec, with its delicate spiritual traceries is the place above all others in which it can find expression.

COMING out of the Chateau Frontenac, the writer asked a veteran cabman if it was true, as alleged, that the genuine habitant was a figure of the past. He replied that it was in a great measure true. The industries of the great cities beckon the young, and they in turn influence the genuine habitant in the direction of modern knowledge and sophistication. Nevertheless, the habitant was alive, and shrewd, and happy in the Province of Quebec. He was ingenuous, naive and warm-hearted to a degree; he loved his simple fields with passion. To take an acre from him was like tearing out his heart strings; he noted the measured sweep of light across his simple fields, and sensed that there was divineness back of it all; he asked no questions of destiny; he said his prayers; he went to church; he confessed his sins and went to sleep in the happy consciousness of duty done.

In respect of the Church, or of his duty towards religion he has asked for no encyclopedic definition. He has not asked to label the Deity; he has not asked to classify Him; he has not compressed Him into a formula; but trusting in the authorities in the churches placed over him in a spiritual sense he goes his way, untroubled by the questions or philosophies of the schools.

Folk-lore still exerts its sway in the back parishes, and the many happy customs which enhance the poetry of life; and where could you find anything more beautiful or exalting than that of the children kneeling for the parental blessing, on New Year's Day? There are many parishes which have yet to be invaded by the newspaper, magazine or book; and here you have the ancient customs in all their pristine completeness. When the time comes for the habitant to divide his farm with his children, the wrench is a bitter one, though somewhat mitigated by the circumstance of his securing for his old age a little home in the village close to the church, in which he can say his prayers at any time of the day or night. The Cure is the friend of the family; in trouble he gives advice; in the matters of the settlement of the family his word is law. He marries the young couple; he knows the family history; he watches with solicitude the career of every member, nor is there a soul in the parish to whom he is indifferent. Having parted with his land he is relieved of all responsibility, and in the evening of life his simple wants are secured. Let no one, and especially from the Province of Ontario, think that the habitant is engaged in a plot to destroy his constitutional or other freedom; he never thought of such a thing. His feelings are too good, his nature too simple; his heart too content ever to become a conspirator.

If to be a gentleman means that one must obey the golden rule, then the habitant can be described by that adjective. He would get up to serve you in the middle of the night; his nature is warm and cordial. In his native attire with his pipe in his mouth, or in the happy sunshine with a song on his lips, he presents, in an age when everybody is sartorially identical, an exceedingly picturesque appearance. The great world has passed him by. He asks no large thing from fortune; he was born on the soil, and the soil to him is sacred; he knows every blade of grass in his simple fields; he knows every quality in the soil that would produce the best results; he is close to the heart of nature; he has intimations from the unseen. We sometimes say of him that he takes his religion mechanically; but to those who know him well, he hints deeper things. At the same time there is nothing gloomy about the habitant's religion, as he told the writer the other day:—"God does not carry a whip behind his back to frighten you." On the contrary, God is a friend, and will never think of sending you to Hades for a game of Five Hundred. And listen to him singing in the happy sunshine—singing the chansons of Old France without a care in the world, unbitten by ambition; content with little; at peace with all men, even the Ontario cannibal, who devours the Frenchman for his dinner. This is a wholesome type in its fidelity; its simplicity; its sense of honor; its happy mixture of the humorous and the serious in life, and should be cherished.

YOU can transmit a finger-nail as well as a fundamental principle of life.

You can send forward a character through the bath-tub; you can produce moral conditions by the use of soap.

Those were splendid scamps, who from Paris came with the colonists of the young French Canadian settlement on the banks of the St. Lawrence; they were adventurers, high sparkling fellows, who preferred pricking an enemy to eating his supper; there were fellows who spent their substance on women in the manner of the King; they were large-hearted creatures who gambled away an estate in a night. There were members of the original colony, who, bringing their women with them, desired to mimic in the new land the amours which had engulfed them in the old, and no doubt there were sincere hearts, which, sick of the vanities of the world, had determined to forsake them and commence life in the new, under wholesome and virile auspices.

You may break all the commandments; but breeding tells; the profligate people had manners. They had grand-mothers; they had half moons on their finger-nails, to pare which delicately was an art. And these people have made transmissions which are operative in the life of the Province. The good people in the Province of Ontario have a notion that the Habitant counts for all there is, in intellect or spirituality, forgetting or not knowing that the French colonists, in many of the members had the most delicate ancestry. Although it is the custom now to appoint Canadian members to the Sulpician Order, as death takes those who have served it, there are still members whose aspect and accent and culture bespeak generations of beautiful breeding. You can see that here in Quebec in the Grande Allee, where there is an aristocracy of intellect, a refinement of feeling and attitude corresponding somewhat to the Faubourg St. Germain, though of course upon a miniature scale.

The Province of Quebec shows more than the blunt finger of the Habitant. Professors from the Sorbonne in Paris who have visited this country have vouched for a pure French accent, delicate French ideals, and an attitude exhalting a most captivating mentality. That class of person is scarcely conscious of difference; but the way he cuts his bread and spreads his butter tells you that racially he belongs to a class by itself. You will see him discussing politics on the Terrace—never loudly. He is keen, but not clamant. He observes the niceties of polite society out or in. His linen is always immaculate. He is never boastful, but something tells you that this man is different. You will frequently find him on the judicial bench—calm, placid, dignified, learned in the law, which he will administer with firmness; but also as far as he can do so, with human sympathy. You could multiply the type across the Te. race in the morning going to business; you can see the model which you would immediately swear was that of a notary—precise, delicate, a lover of lingual purity, dainty to his finger tips; with nails which it would be a horror to leave unmanicured. He is learned in the law, he knows human nature profoundly, for in making notarial settlements he has plumbed the depths of human feeling. The type is found of course in the legal profession; but the life of the bar is so strenuous that something of delicacy is rubbed off in the course of years. One has seen that restored in the course of time, and the fine gentleman emerge from the forensic bully.

We have, of course, the universal ballot in the Province of Quebec, and a democracy by which we swear; but there is something captivating amid the rushing forces of life, to find creatures who still maintain the high instincts of their race, and give to the community gracious aspects, redemptive in their character.

It was a glorious Spring afternoon when Mrs. Ross and her niece, Alison Gordon, just out from the East, took possession of their Tillicum home. Great masses of velvety wall-flowers bloomed in the sunny angle by the veranda, crocuses lifted up cups of purple, gold, and white, snowdrops and primroses pressed against the ivy covered fence, and a great bed of budding violets gave promise of future delight.

"Just to think of all this bloom in March," cried Mrs. Ross.

"Later, I shall have a perfectly lovely garden. Just look at the rose-bushes! Of course everything has been running wild since the last tenants left, but a good gardener and the Vancouver Island climate will soon remedy that."

"Mrs. Oswald says, that you were fortunate in getting Sing, that he is an excellent gardener, and a good house-servant as well."

"Humph, so she told me, quite in the same class as her Wo and Major Colby's Wong. Sleek and brushed, with eyes in the backs of their heads, patting around in soft-soled slippers, and seeing and knowing far too much. I suppose that I shall get used to Oriental help in time, but for the present Sing may confine his energies to the garden and to your hen yards."

"Here he is now, wanting something," went on Mrs. Ross. "You talk to him, Alison, I can't make out half what he tries to tell me."

"Bossy-lady, no matchee," announced the Chinaman.

"That's plain enough," laughed Alison.

"Altogether too plain," grumbled her aunt, "there always has to be something forgotten, and I just must have a cup of tea right away. He can go to the next house and borrow a few matches."

"But that is where Major Colby lives," demurred Alison, "and you remember what Mrs. Oswald said about his objections to being neighbourly, and his quarrels and lawsuits with tenants who preceded us, and besides, he is disappointed in not getting your shore fields as extra pasture for his thorough-bred stock. He'll likely be 'pernicketty' if we begin borrowing the very first day."

"Well, he'll have to be," declared Mrs. Ross, "for I must have a cup of tea right away. It's a mile to the village and only a few yards to the Major's house. He surely won't be snippy about a little thing like that, though he has announced that he wants no dealings, whatever, with his neighbors."

"You, Sing, go Major Colby, get matches. Sing hurried off, and presently returned with the matches, which he presented with a voluble message that Alison interpreted to the effect, that they were welcome to the matches, but for the future the Major was adverse to borrowing and lending.

"He no wantee white ladies come here; white ladies too much talkee."

"He needn't worry, we'll not trouble him again," declared Mrs. Ross, a hostile light in her grey eyes. "Go right down to the village, Alison, and get a supply of matches. I'll return what the Major has sent, and there'll be no further borrowing from him. Never, under any circumstance."

Household effects, lumber for renovating chicken houses, (Alison was going into the chicken-raising business) and rolls of netting and fence wire were unloaded during the afternoon, with much hooting of horns and chugging of motor trucks.

"The same old thing" grumbled Major Colby, "noise and borrowing, and later on there will be chicken nuisances." He was keeping a careful watch upon the doings next door from his glassed-in veranda. "They have begun the noise and borrowing without delay and—Eh, what, I'm not going to have their Chinaman coming over here wasting Wong's time!"

The Major got up in haste to intercept Sing's way to the kitchen, and was surprised to find that it was himself, not Wong, that Sing desired speech with.

"Bossy-lady, she say all samee matchee. Thankee. No more."

"Eh, what?" The Major made no effort to take the proffered matches. He had watched Alison's trim figure tripping village-ward, and had an uneasy consciousness that she had gone for these matches. "Right in the midst of unpacking, what a boor she will think me."

"All samee matchee," reiterated Sing, "You takee."

"Poof, poof," with the same gesture the Major lightly waved aside matches and Chinaman.

"All samee, all samee" persisted Sing, with an abiding memory of Mrs. Ross's face when she handed them to him. The new bossy-lady was one that meant to be obeyed.

The Major had a distinguished war record and he too was used to prompt obedience. His expression when he gave the width of chicken wire and long tendrils of English ivy set to cover it.

"The Major's view into his neighbor's grounds will be entirely shut off by the time that he gets back from his summer cruise," declared Mrs. Oswald, "and what he can't see and has no knowledge of, ought to tend for peace."

All summer, Mrs. Ross, aided by Sing, gardened in a rose-elysium with no fear of winter's killing frosts to mar her happiness, and Alison, freed from a five years' grind of school teaching, set to work upon her poultry venture with enthusiastic will, tending the four hundred Plymouth rock chickens with the happy certainty of success in her new venture.

There was no doubt of the genuine sympathy and interest in Major Colby's voice as he edged around to get a better view of Alison's face.

second wave of dismissal, sent Sing scurrying home match box in hand.

"Take those matches right back and leave them," called Mrs. Ross from the top of a step ladder. "Go!"

Sing, between the figurative frying-pan and the fire, hurried out into the yard, hopped upon a packing-case, hurled the box of matches into Major Colby's garden, and went back to his work of repairing the hen yard.

The box of "Eddy's non-poisonous golden tips" came hurtling over a holly bush, escaped the Major's Roman nose by a hair's breadth, and landed in the bed of violets which their owner had been brushing over with loving fingers.

"Eh, what the deuce does that confounded Chinaman mean?" he began angrily, then stopped and laughed. "The gage of battle I presume," he chuckled as he pocketed the matches.

The bright Spring days were full of work and social activities for Mrs. Ross and Alison, and neither troubled herself about the Major's vagaries.

We Tillicumites whispered, "check-mate" when we saw the line fence between the two properties being topped by a

THE Major was away on a long cruise in his yacht and it was not until a morning, late in August, that Alison announced; "I see the Major's yacht anchored in the Cove, he's back again."

"I hope that he will appreciate the ivy screen," observed her aunt. "It answers two purposes, keeps his eyes out and our chickens in. Mrs. Oswald told me that it was chicken depredations that stirred up the lawsuit with the last tenant of this property, and a dog fight and a roving pig were causes of other legal troubles."

"I am inclined to think that if a dozen smart young pullets were to get busy in your garden, Aunt, there would be a decided rise in temperature."

"Probably there would," conceded Mrs. Ross, "but the Major doesn't keep hens, so that is not likely to happen, but I'm not so sure that he won't raise trouble over the morning crowings of your noisy, young roosters."

"I shouldn't wonder if he did" agreed Alison, "we'll not think of it for fear of telepathy. I propose that we go fishing, the tide is just right for sea trout. I'll get the rods and we'll go down to the Oswald's landing."

"Sorry, but I can't. I have to oversee Sing, he's moving the north trellis. Remember, Alison, there's no moon, and don't stay late."

"I'll remember," promised Alison, "and you'll be sure to have the fish you love for breakfast."

When accompanied by her aunt, Alison always followed the wood-land highroad that led to the beach and their fishing place on the Oswald's wharf. When alone she usually cut through a woods' path across the Colby property saving a good half mile. Time was precious this evening. The low sun was filtering through the branches of the immense Douglas firs, and glancing along the reach of tall straight trunks, that stood like the grey old columns in some vast cathedral. Beyond the wood the path led through an area of giant stumps. The trees had been sawed several feet above the ground, in the prodigal way of the West, and around the great stumps grew a wilderness of spirea, fireweed, and bracken.

Alison stooped to put a marking bough against a specially beautiful little clump of local maiden-hair fern, which she intended to pre-empt on her way home. As her hands swept wide the bracken, she came suddenly upon a little fawn-like calf, dead apparently, head stretched flat, eyes closed, relaxed inert body.

"O, the poor, pretty, little creature, it's one of Colby's thorough-breds. It has got through the pasture fence into this rough land, and has died here, too bad."

If Alison had known as much about calf nature as she did about hen idiosyncrasies, she would have gone on at once, and have left the calf undisturbed in its hiding place, but Fate took a hand, and advised her to touch the little creature with her fishing rod. The apparently dead calf raised such a furious, fear-stricken bleat that Alison jumped a foot into the air, and following hard upon the calf's call came a young Jersey cow, smashing and crashing through the underbrush, horns down, and murder in her red eyes.

Life is sweet, and Alison's brain worked quickly. A few feet away was an especially tall stump with notches cut in the side, and a log lying beneath. While the cow was making sure that her precious calf was unharmed, she flew to the stump, and clinging and scratching like a squirrel managed to swarm up the balsamy side to a safety spot on the top. With a bellow of rage the cow charged after her and the last lap of the climb was finished in record time.

She was mighty thankful at first for her "Stylites" refuge, but her thankfulness began to ooze as time slipped by and the cow still stood on guard. In vain she shooed and shouted, the calf slept and the mother watched.

"If that Rip van Winkle of a calf would waken, there would be a chance of her moving off with it, as it is she is strictly on to her job," grumbled Alison after a second furtive slipping down from the stump and a frantic scramble back again.

After a long interval of waiting the calf finished its nap and demanded its supper, and was then nosed off into the underbrush by the mother.

"I'll wait until I am reasonably sure that she has gone, and then I'll slip down on the opposite side and run—My goodness, what next?"

Along the path from the beach came Major Colby on his way home from fishing, basket slung over his shoulder and rod in hand. His loud, cheerful whistle unconsciously carrying a challenge to the militant cow.

Instantly there was a loud, whirring crash in the underbrush and the cow came charging directly for him.

"Hi, there, you—"

"Run, run for your life!" shrieked Alison, as she saw the Major turning to do battle with his fishing rod. "Here, this stump, quick!"

Fortunately for the Major, the calf set up a wail and the mother rushed to it, giving him time to make good his retreat.

"Discretion is the better part of valor in this case," he panted. "I didn't know that she had a young calf; she's a wild animal pro tem. Have you been here long, Miss Gordon?"

"An hour, but it has seemed far longer than that."

"We're likely to continue the vigil indefinitely," observed the Major as he picked bark splinters from his hands. "I'm greatly obliged to you for sanctuary, for this is

The Convenient Kitchen

By Collier Stevenson

JUNE brides and model kitchens! They really do go hand-in-hand—for, of course, each little June bride wants her new kitchen to be perfect in plan, arrangement and equipment. And in this she is wise, as the general comfort of any household is to a great extent dependent upon a well-ordered kitchen. Into the achievement of a thoroughly convenient kitchen, therefore, an infinite amount of time, thought and effort may be put, with the assurance of ultimate pleasure and profit in generous measure.

The kitchen has very appropriately been called the workshop of the home. In order to deserve that designation, however, a kitchen must be so carefully planned and conveniently appointed that real efficiency in the handling of every household duty is directly promoted. Convenience, then, is the chief and logical goal to set, whether in acquiring a new kitchen or in redeeming one of an earlier period.

It is surely apparent that, for real convenience, the various essential features which enter into the equipment of a kitchen should be fairly close together—and this rather points to the value of a comparatively small room. Indeed, every square foot of area not absolutely necessary for comfortable working conditions, and for the co-operation of two or three people upon special occasions, is not only an economic waste, but a nuisance. Additional labor is involved in caring for the useless floor-space, to say nothing of the wear and tear of countless extra steps day after day.

Nevertheless, before actually deciding in favor of a small kitchen, it is always desirable to take into consideration the fuel that is to be used for cooking and heating. A coal-fire, for instance, gives out an intense and continuous heat: therefore, it is apt to make a very small kitchen uncomfortably hot. That is true also of a wood-fire, although the heat is not continuous. Natural gas, artificial gas, electricity and coal-oil are, however, all suitable fuels for cooking in a kitchen of compact size in which arrangements have been made for heating the room by either hot air, vapour or hot water.

In this kitchen, especial attention has been devoted to a built-in equipment that leaves little to be desired. The sink, which is fitted with two drain-boards, is placed beneath a cupboard, glass-doored and plentifully supplied with shelves. This cupboard also has a sliding door that opens up to a similar cupboard in the adjoining pantry; and this saves the carrying of dishes to and fro. The other cupboard installed in the kitchen is also glass-doored; and its shelves are ranged with glass stoppered bottles having their contents plainly labeled. This is a sanitary and time-saving method of handling supplies which might well be adopted in every home. The table used in this kitchen is chiefly interesting because its composition top has a high-ridged edge to prevent the falling to the floor of dishes or supplies.

With the marvellous increase in electrical development and in the transmission of power to hitherto remote sections, there is a growing demand for electric cooking appliances. Both the all-electric and the all-gas installations have much in their favor for the kitchen of small dimensions: for, in addition to their convenience for cooking and baking, they spell greater ease in handling much of the other routine work incidental to a kitchen. Whether or not they are more economical than coal or wood in maintenance is, of course, a debatable point: but, on the surface at least, they would appear to incline towards greater economy, because their power may be shut off when not actually required.

In placing a range, it is very important to provide for proper lighting both by day and night. If possible, there should be a light either directly above or at one side of the range for the hours after nightfall and a window to the left for daytime use. Where practicable, a double lighting equipment would, of course, be still better: that is, a window and an artificial light upon each side of the range. The flanking windows would, naturally, be as useful for ventilating as for lighting—and ventilation is one of the very vital points to consider, as it affects not only the kitchen, but the entire house.

Good ventilation can be attained by several methods. An ordinary metal ventilator, placed near the ceiling in the wall behind the range, is one of the simplest of devices. Much more expensive—and proportionately more effective—is a sheet-metal hood over the range. Under ideal conditions, the hood is continued over the sink, that excessive steam may also be drawn out of the kitchen. Still another device is a plastered hood, equipped with one or two ventilating flues. The larger these ventilating flues can be made, the better: in order that they may cope with unusual conditions, as well as with normal—that, in short, they may be depended upon to draw off the very last trace of odor when something on the range boils over or burns. When gas is being used as the cooking-fuel, one large flue is ample for both the vent pipe of the range and of the flue: but, for either a coal or a wood range, it is necessary to have entirely separate flues, as any ventilation into a smoke-flue inevitably acts as a damper.

But to provide ventilation for the range is not sufficient: the entire kitchen requires facilities for a complete change of air periodically, as well as for a cross or

In this white-painted kitchen, the range and the hot-water boiler are provided with a hooded niche built of flat-faced cement-blocks - a material that is also used both as a hearth and as a flooring beneath the sink. Ventilators placed high within the nich serve to draw off all the steam and odors emanating from the range, and thereby improve the general atmosphere of the kitchen. The placement of the sink is commendable, both in relation to the range and to the group of high casement windows which insure abundant light at all hours of the day. For evening service, the combination electric-and-gas fixture is also admirably placed, as the range and the sink can be equally well-lighted. Conveniently near the range, a commodious closet is arranged for the storage of pots and pans.

The Idol of Youth

forehand and in detail; I wasn't, however, made of sugar or salt; and provided Gauthier didn't "confound me with his knavish tricks," I hoped to "stick" any tests to which he could put me.

We were invited into what the partners called their "bureau" a long, bare room, in a matchboard building, where I boldly suggested that our business might bore Miss Kapieha. Wouldn't she prefer to stop outside, and watch other instructors teach the Young Idea, not to shoot, but to fly? The girl hesitated, reading my secret anxiety. Le Beau Sabreur, however, was not going to have his fun spoiled. "Mademoiselle will not be bored. On the contrary she will be amused," he intervened. "She has been through this herself—had been through it before I met her first, as fine a pilot at fifteen years of age, as were many men when they began to fight the Bosches. We all like to see others do what we have done ourselves. And if Mademoiselle leaves us, it will be because she thinks le Capitaine Malet's feelings are sensitive."

"She needn't be afraid of that," said I. Patchinka entered the bureau; but there Borisoff was promptly summoned by telephone to the far end of the flying ground where a pupil had just "pancaked." I was left to the tender mercies of Gauthier. But never was an instructor more polite than he! Beginning, he explained kindly that there were tests which every man must undergo, before he "took the air." Of course, things were different now from in war time. I had been a soldier, and no doubt my lungs, heart and eyesight were satisfactory. His word, but examination had been severe for the military air service! Nowadays, however, these tried amateurs, these spoiled darlings who played at flying when danger was past—their blood, if any, was on their own heads! Yet even so, a few technicalities must be observed in a self-respecting school.

With this preface, Gauthier asked me for my handkerchief. I gave it—a large linen one, having my name neatly marked on it with indelible ink by Aunt Sarah.

"Shall I tie it round his eyes?" ventured Patchinka.

"Thanks, no, Mademoiselle," replied Gauthier. "I have more strength than you." He knotted the folded handkerchief round my head with a vicious pull that flattened my eyelids. Petro growled at the liberty. Never till that moment had I thoroughly appreciated the dog!

My eyes squeezed into darkness, I was handed a cube of wood on which a tuning fork was supported by a small disc. The trick was, on Gauthier's sharp order, to lift and lower this cube three times in succession without upsetting the equilibrium of the fork. Luckily for me, I and some pals of mine in Russia had invented various games for trying the steadiness of our hands, and had bet as much as we could afford on our own success. Patchinka clapped hands in applause at the end of that experiment; but I was far from being out of the woods yet.

"That is a flea bite!" remarked Gauthier—or its French equivalent. He then took me by the arm, not too gently, and led me somewhere. We went up and down, and round about. Wind blew on me; noise increased; I knew that I had been guided out of the "bureau" into open air. Gauthier ran me up a flight of steps, and stopped. "You are now about to place your foot on an inclined plank," he announced. "How high above the ground it is, you need not know, nor what is at the other end. But this much I will tell you, the plank is not broad. The rest—as say les Americans, is 'up to you.' Allez, Monsieur! En Avant!"

I allezed. I avanted. If I was afraid, I must say in self defence it wasn't of danger, but I thought I heard men laughing. I knew I was a figure of fun, and I didn't want Patchinka to be ashamed of me. I forged steadily ahead, or as steadily as was possible on a plank which sloped downwards to sliding point, and felt under foot like a piece of stretched elastic.

"To step aside is human!" I quoted Burns beneath my breath; but what I wished to be, was superhuman. Just how many inches grace I had between me and space I didn't know and didn't dare speculate, lest I should sprawl headlong.

But counting 'one, two, three' I plodded on, one foot before the other, as Red Indians walk, until at last I just saved myself from a stumble. My leading toe had struck some obstacle.

Luckily I pulled up just in time—and fancied I heard a gasp from Patchinka. Lifting my foot cautiously, I stepped onto another plank, which was supported on the first. This one sloped up instead of down; and at the top came another flight of stairs descending earthward. Gauthier made no move to help me, but unaided I reached ground, proving its solidity with a triumphant stamp of the foot.

"You'll need a drink of good wine after that!" cried Gauthier's voice. A tumbler was thrust into my hand; and hardly had I grasped it when a pistol-shot rang out close to my startled ear.

How I avoided jumping like a frog, and deluging my coat with the contents of that tumbler, I scarcely know. But instinct had told me that le Beau Sabreur wasn't inviting me to drink for my soul's or body's health. Perhaps I'd read of, and only half forgotten, tests like these, tried on the "quirks," as flying cadets used to be called in war time days. Anyhow, praise be to my patron saint (Christopher, of course; he who could without stumbling cross a river!) my hand didn't jerk. "Bravo!" cried Patchinka. And with her praise in my ears, for me Gauthier's name was Mud.

He hadn't finished with me yet, however, though he whisked the bandage off my eyes. With a laugh, he let me see that, if I'd lost my balance on the sloped plank, even at the highest point I should have fallen no more than six or seven feet. Others watched the show, besides Patchinka, for we were out of doors, behind the bureau, and several pupils of the school hung about hoping, boy-like, that I might come to grief. I was led inside once more, and planted in a chair at the end of the room, my back against the wall.

Seated thus, I had no time to get my bearings before Gauthier let down from the ceiling a number of objects which looked like cannon balls attached by rings to lengths of rope. Darting from one to the other he set them all furiously swinging. It looked as if the middle ball must hit me plump on the forehead unless I dodged; and if I dodged one of the others was bound to get me.

Physically, I never wanted more to do anything in a hurry than slide off my chair onto the floor. Morally, I never so much wished to do anything as sit still with a grin of indifference. Remembering the Arabian Nights and the Tempter Voices helped me a bit, and the thought of Patchinka helped far more. I may have blinked, and my grin may have twitched, but it stuck to my face, and so did I to the chair. The swinging cannon balls (which of course weren't cannon balls) came just short of reaching me, as they were carefully measured to do; and as they slowed down like bloated pendulums, Patchinka peeped from behind a screen at the far end of the big room.

"I knew you would never flinch!" she exclaimed. "But Petro has been worried. I had to hold him behind the screen, to keep him from springing to your rescue—or else jumping upon Monsieur Gauthier. You see, Monsieur Gauthier, what sort of pupil you have."

"I am so far satisfied," replied my instructor. But with him being satisfied was an emotion distinct from being pleased.

I was now ready for my first flight; or rather, le Beau Sabreur was ready to give it me. If I could have chosen, I should have waited till my nerves had ceased to vibrate their echo of the "tests." But it wasn't my metier to plead for time, and I refused the cigarette which Gauthier offered, as one offers a soother to a man on his way to execution.

The next act on the programme was to put me into a coat of well worn leather, smelling of oil; a pair of sheepskin garments resembling thigh boots; a leather helmet; goggles, and mittens, and when I was thus adorned, Gauthier invited me in English to "come along."

"Wait till I've wished you good luck!" cried Patchinka, slipping into my hand her tiny one. "You've had severe tests," she whispered. "Things they used to do in war time. You mayn't love flying just at first. You have too much imagination. But don't be discouraged. By and by you'll be like me about it. I wish I were going to take you up instead of le Sabreur. Of course, though, I can't ask him to let me do that!"

"Of course not," I said. "But I'll try not to disgrace myself. And some day I'll hope to do you credit."

"You have done me credit. I'm proud of you," the little thing heartened me, like a small mother encouraging an overgrown child. "Wait just one second! Before you go up with Gauthier, who will tease you all he can, would you like to hear the secret name I gave you that night in Bournemouth when you fished us out of the sea, and took us dripping wet to Mr. Horden's hotel?"

"Wouldn't I—rather?"

"Well! You remember I told Mr. Horden I'd have no brother except Sacha. But I had my own name for you. Now you shall take it with you into the air, to think of if Gauthier tries to 'rattle' you—silly Gauthier, who doesn't know you, or he'd not waste his time! I named you for my favourite hero of history when I was a school girl. Don't laugh! You are for me Duguesclin, the man who never lost his head; the 'landless knight.' Live up to that."

"Thanks! I'll do my—damnedest!" I said, squeezing the little hand. (Gauthier would have kissed it!) "But—is a landless knight a Knight of the Air?"

"He will be—he must be!" Patchinka breathed.

CHAPTER XXIV.

What Became of the Cold Potato!

A battered biplane had been run out from its canvas lair for Gauthier's use, the machine in which he'd alighted (it seemed a week ago!) having disappeared skyward with another instructor. Gauthier explained that this was an old Fokker, taken in the war and bought cheap. Then he began to spout technical talk about the engine. There, however, I was more or less at home, thanks to experience with motor cars and tanks; and in a reckless moment I ventured to flaunt my knowledge. Gauthier seized on this imprudence as a cat grabs a mouse stealing out from its mice safe hole.

"Ah, my Captain, why did you at first conceal the fact that you are a trained mechanic?" You led me into a foolish mistake, and would have caused us both to waste time! Stupidly I'd have taken you up for your first flight—if it is your first?—as a mere passenger. You, who are in such haste to manage a 'plane of your own. 'Intensive training' was your expression to Borisoff, I think? Good! We will be intensive. With what you already know of engines of various types, a short lesson on terra firma with this machine, and I can put you through a few easy paces in the air. That is what you would like, is it not?—and Mademoiselle would wish it also?"

"Yes," I said, trying to look delighted, and succeeding as well as a seasick man with whom it's noblesse oblige to smoke a black cigar.

I wondered why I'd ever thought I should like flying. I had never had these qualms on board a tank, even under heavy fire. I loved my tank, I had the sort of affection for it I should have entertained for a tame elephant. Tanks were bigger than aeroplanes, I now reminded myself, uglier customers altogether, and quite as complicated. Why worry over tackling this exaggerated bird?

Still, there it was! I must, I feared, be earthy of the earth. So far, nothing on the ground floor of this world had ever upset me much. It was leaving my own level for the aerial top story of an invisible sky-scraper which made me feel as if I'd swallowed a large, cold, boiled potato.

I couldn't call up a flash of that enthusiasm which I'd waved before Aunt Sarah one historic Sunday at Bournemouth. "Jump in glory" indeed. If there were no Lady from the Air in my life, I should now have wished myself back in Bournemouth, immersed with tea and toast in the Homeland Hotel, instead of learning how to fly with Gauthier of Nice.

But there was a Lady, and if I didn't love her Air, she would never love me.

This thought warmed the cold potato. And I asked myself what Duguesclin would do in my circumstances?

He was a big fellow, like me, not fitted for the Air, any more than I was; yet he would doubtless have soared for the first time with the courage of a lion leaping a chasm.

Patchinka drew near to watch the lesson, and Gauthier, (who'd magnified my knowledge of mechanics in order to justify his own rashness) now that the girl was within earshot, belittled my experience.

"After all, my Captain, an aeroplane is nobler than an automobile or a tank," he informed me. "Don't start by thinking you know too much. Don't be impatient. Off with your coat and mittens again for this business! I may make you sweat a little for your own good, before we've done."

He did, and more than a little. "Intensive" was indeed the word for his method. I wished heartily I'd never used or heard it. Gauthier hurried over his verbal instructions as a worldly monk hurries the telling of his beads, and kept me on the jump. But—Duguesclin, I remembered, as a stripling, "never had to be told the same thing twice. His memory, like his strength, was prodigious. In arts of war he soon excelled his teachers."

I'd promised Patchinka to live up to him (a pity she hadn't chosen a less conspicuous hero) and doubtless a Joystick was as simple to learn the use of, as a battle-axe—if only you could think so.

But—did I think so? There seemed to be a lot of things to do with a Joystick whenever with a battle axe you merely clove your enemy's head if you could; and that was that. Besides, you weren't called on to do much else at the same time. With this Joystick business, how different.

The THING (I saw it in capitals) controlled the angle of flight, whether up or down. That was something to remember as well as do. And then there was another THING called the Rudder bar, with which your feet had to be on terms of intimacy, in order to move the plane from right to left in the air.

Aye, there was the rub: in Air! I hadn't minded doing a number of things all at once, in tank in Russia; and in France going over the top had held a certain wild spice; but present sensations suggested that I was not cut out for a bird man.

It was well enough to fuss with the throttle, which controlled engine speed, and the revolution-counter which told what the speed was when controlled. The incline meter which should help me keep a level keel—wings neither tipping up nor dipping down—might in the abstract have fascination. But the thought that I must presently juggle with this bag of tricks in air, not on earth, spoiled the charm. I heartily disliked the oil-pressure gauge; and the compass which (if I didn't forget to look) might save me from bashing my nose against the wrong mountain, was a sinister reminder of responsibilities to come.

"Isn't he quick about picking up what you tell him?" Patchinka prompted Gauthier to a compliment, but he failed to respond.

"We shall now see how well he remembers what he has so quickly picked up," smiled my instructor. "I think there's nothing more to detain us, my Captain. Will you bid Mademoiselle goodbye—or let us hope it may be only au revoir!"

With that, he climbed lithely into the cockpit of the aeroplane, and busied himself in getting out a couple of telephone receivers. "Hop in!" he directed in English, casually as a motorist might give some roadside pedestrian a lift. And I was conscious of awkwardness as I clambered into the fuselage, by means of metal-shod niches on the body of the machine.

"Here's your speaking tube," said Gauthier. "You'll need it for instructions, as when we start my voice will be lost in the noise. It will be a big noise, I warn you! Bigger than the noise of fifty tanks. And it will be in your ears. Do not lose your head."

Rage lit a flame of courage, though whether the AIR would blow it out before that potato boiled in my breast, who could tell?

I was strapped in place with a safety belt, the need for which was not a peace-

Your boy!

For all too short a while he will be in your home.

There comes a time in every boy's life when his dislike for washing suddenly disappears, and for mysterious reasons he begins to scrub.

While he is still with you, encourage this cleanliness. "So great is the effect of cleanliness upon man that it extends even to his moral character."

Give him plenty of Ivory Soap for his face and hands. He can wash a dozen times a day with Ivory and his skin will still be soft and smooth.

Give him Ivory for his bath—it lathers so richly, it rinses off so quickly and "It floats!" It is pure and mild; white and fragrant, too.

In all these seven different ways, Ivory is a manly, friendly, fine soap for boys.

Whenever soap comes into contact with the skin—use Ivory.

WILLOWGATE

THE waters of Sandy Bay were shallow, and it took but the lightest puff of breeze to send the ripples scurrying. The bright sun of the clear June morning made everything about the bay so pleasant that all the little outdoor people were abroad early. The shore was of clean yellow sand, and but a few yards out from the water's edge grew a fringe of green rushes always swaying to the wind or the wavelets.

These rushes made a playground for a large, bright-winged dragon-fly who had just one name—Flash. It was easy to see why he had that name, for he darted here and there so swiftly that eyes could not have followed him if it had not been for the glinting of sunlight on his smooth body and shiny wings. Every now and then he would come to rest on one of the swaying reeds; his four broad wings outspread, his long, tapering body teetering on his thin legs.

The color of Flash the dragon-fly's body was a deep chocolate-brown, and the transparent wings were barred and spotted with the same quiet, rich hue. From his perch on the reed Flash could see all that was going on at or near the shore. He was most wide-a-woke, and his eyes, besides being keen, were large and beautiful, with tiny flecks of yellow like those in a piece of polished goldstone.

This morning, however, Flash was not altogether satisfied with Sandy Bay.

"I've seen all there is around here," said the dragon-fly to himself. "I know everyone, from Crusty, the snapping-turtle, to the thousand and one brown and black Queen of Spain butterflies. I'm going to see if I can't find something new."

A break in the line of reeds showed the spot where the sand-beach was broken also by the waters of a small stream, that here found an outlet in the little bay.

"I know what I'll do," said the dragon-fly aloud, "I'll follow the stream; it will be a change anyway."

He took his time, darting from bank to bank and back again, resting often, but watching always for something, or someone strange to him. The little stream wound across the meadows, and before Flash had gone far he could see ahead of him two rows of willows, a row on either bank, close to the water's edge, and with branches overhanging the stream.

He had almost reached the first of the willows when a sharp voice bade him halt, and the dragon-fly saw Flamewing, the red-winged blackbird, perched on a nearby shrub.

"You can't come any nearer, Master Flash. No one may pass Willowgate without my permission."

The dragon-fly knew Flamewing very well, and was more than a little bit surprised at the sharp way he had spoken. He flew to a perch close to the bird and asked: "Do you own this place?"

"Well, not exactly," replied Flamewing, "but I gave myself the job of gate-keeper. This is Willowgate, you know."

The bird pointed an outstretched wing toward the row of willows that lined each side of the stream.

"There isn't a real gate, of course," continued Flamewing, "but the stream that runs between the willows is the water-road to the home of Bluffer, the builder."

"O, I know him," laughed Flash, the dragon-fly "he isn't such an important fellow; he is just Bluffer the muskrat."

"I suppose you think you know all about Master Bluffer," answered Flamewing in a very huffy tone.

"I don't know all about anything, but I am anxious to learn," said Flash.

"I understand," chuckled the blackbird, "your head is empty and you want me to find something to put in it."

The dragon-fly did not reply to this bit of sauciness, but said: "Then you are going to let me pass through Willowgate."

"I'm going to do more than that," said Flamewing, "I'm going with you."

It was a race through Willowgate, a flying dash above the smooth water, with the fresh, light green of the willows on either side. The dragon-fly was past the trees before the blackbird had got fairly started. When the feathered chap joined him, the dragon-fly said:

"I can see Bluffer's hay-stack away ahead."

The blackbird did not reply, but flew further up stream, which broadened as it ran slowly between low banks, with the rich rank growth of beaver grass, with, here and there marshy patches aglow with golden buttercups.

It was not long until Flamewing and Flash arrived at what the dragon-fly had called "Bluffer's hay-stack." It looked like a carelessly-heaped pile of reeds, sticks, and grasses rising above the surface of the water, not quite in the cen-

"When the ice came all around his house, Bluffer was no prisoner," said Flamewing. "He had provided a tunnel-doorway for himself, which led down under water, and through which he might go at any time to feed upon the lily roots at the bottom."

"It's a fine, safe place," said the dragon-fly, "but pretty stuffy with only an underwater doorway."

"Bluffer is not so foolish as to have a house like that," said Flamewing. "There is a fine air-hole, somewhere in this roof, that leads down through the ceiling of his living-room."

"Where's Bluffer now?" inquired the dragon-fly.

Instead of replying, the blackbird led the way further up stream where the banks were higher and drier. There was no sign of the muskrat, nor, indeed, could the dragon-fly see any place where Bluffer could hide.

There was a slight splash near the bank, and the whiskered face of Bluffer appeared above the surface tre of the stream, to a height of between two and three feet.

The dragon-fly immediately perched on the top of the hummock, and began calling out at the top of his voice:

"Come out, Master Bluffer! Come out of your house! Don't you know you have visitors to-day?"

"Ho! Ho! Ho!" laughed the red-winged blackbird, "You're wasting your breath, Flash. Bluffer the muskrat doesn't live here except in the wintertime. He built this place last Autumn, and if you could see inside, you would find that, just above highwater-mark, there is a cosy, little room lined warmly with grass and leaves. Underneath the grass and sticks you see here on the roof, is a weather-tight wall of clay."

"But how did Bluffer get in his house, and how did he ever get out?" questioned the dragon-fly.

"This is the place," said Flamewing, alighting on the bank where it sloped steeply back from the water. After searching for a while, the bird found a hole in the ground, which was almost concealed from view by the long grass around it. "This is Bluffer's dry-door," explained the bird; "the tunnel slopes back and down, joining another hallway that leads back under the bank to the living-room of Bluffer's summer-house. I know there is an air-hole to this living-room, too, but I won't bother hunting for it."

He didn't need to hunt, for he stepped right in the air-chimney.

"Get off my roof!" rumbled the voice of Bluffer the muskrat from underground.

"So you're awake at last," called the blackbird down the air-chimney.

"Who is it?" asked the muskrat gruffly.

"Come out and see for yourself," said the saucy Flamewing.

Flash the dragon-fly watched the tunnel-doorway, but the muskrat did not appear. There was a slight splash near the bank, and the whiskered face of Bluffer appeared above the surface.

"Humph!" grunted the muskrat. "It's only a red-winged blackbird and a dragon-fly."

"How did he get out?" asked Flash in a low voice.

"He has an under-water doorway to his summerhouse, as well as to his winter-house," answered Flamewing.

Bluffer the muskrat was cross and sulky. He would not talk, but began making a meal of sweet flag roots.

It was very hot in the sunshine, and, presently, the muskrat went back into his summer-house.

Flash and Flamewing made a slow journey back through Willowgate, for the red-winged blackbird stopped at every tree to gossip with bird, bee and butterfly. When the end of the line of willows was reached, Flamewing perched upon the little shrub where the dragon-fly had seen him first. Then as Flash darted onward to his playground amongst the waving reeds, he said to himself:

"Poor Bluffer! He has to wear a fur coat all summer long. I'd rather be a dragon-fly than be a muskrat, even if he has two houses."

JUNE FRIENDS.

A tree is the most beautiful of living things. The harebell or the wood violet may be more dainty and more delicately garbed. The scarlet lily or the purple iris may be more gay, but of them all none holds the charm of a single floss-budded twig of pussy-willow, or a branch-tip hanging green with the first, tiny leaves of the birch.

All trees are beautiful in spring, because it is then that the change from the stark bareness of winter to budding life again is one of Nature's most welcome transformations. Their beauty is more noticed in spring, but it is in June that they reach the greatness of their splendor, and the charm of the forest is at its height.

Among my friends are numbered more than a few trees. There is a tall Lombardy poplar that towers at the end of a row of like trees that shelter a house built high on a wind-swept hill. In June it is a tall cone of fresh, living green, with its leaves always whispering a welcome to me and to the brown tree-creepers who may almost always be found around it.

There is a great oak that stands at the wood's edge, almost as if it were walking out from amongst the smaller trees. It is a generous friend, for, besides the pleasure it gives to me in shade or the mere sight of its grandly spreading branches, here among its leaves the orioles swing their cradle-nests.

On a rocky point looking out over a northern lake, a crooked, stunted pine stands alone. You might not call it beautiful, but to me it is beautifully brave for its sturdiness in facing the storm winds. In June, too, the birds come to the little tree and make a song perch of a bend in its crooked trunk.

Within my garden there grows a little tree, strong and sturdy, (I'm sure that I may call it a tree) and in the month of June it blossoms. Each flower is a deep red rose, petals unfolding and unfolding, but always there is still a heart as if the rose had always more of sweetness to disclose.

Each tree is beautiful, but there is no time like June to learn to know them well and number them among your friends.

ON SWORDS

AND, in the olden days, the sword unfailing opened the door to fame, and clove through battle and through tournament the way to honor and renown.

There is the legend of the "good sword Excalibur," of how King Arthur took it from a magic hand that rose above the surface of a lake. A mighty sword was this Excalibur, whose fame has lasted to this very day, and scarcely a tale is told of Arthur without one hearing of the "wonder-blade."

HEALTH BY WIRELESS.

RADIO Health Talks may be "all the fashion" by the time you see this in print.

A "Wireless Outfit" is as much prized for the Boy's Birthday Present today as a Bicycle or a six-bladed knife or a hatchet used to be when you were a boy. But if you want the boy to keep his health, don't let him sit up till 2.00 a.m. It is not worth it. You must help him to keep his good health. They say that it is not quiet enough to "Listen In" before about 11.00 p.m. or 12.00 midnight. But the Radio Health Talks I am going to tell you about began at 7.40 p.m. and they only lasted five minutes. The boy could "Listen In" and go to bed in good time. The "Radio Talks" are given by courtesy of the American General Electric Company and are "broadcast" twice each week from Radio Station W. G. Y. which is the name of the Schenectady Station.

The first one took place on March 24, 1921.

WHO WAS FIRST?

Very likely British Stations in England or India may have been sending out Radio Health Talks. But the English Brother does not boast and seldom describes his doings. At any rate, we have not heard of any Government Health Organization in Britain or Canada which has sent out Radio Health Talks yet.

No. I am not going to send out Radio Health Talks, as at present advised. I like this way of talking to you better. What is written or printed remains, and you can read it again. Do you keep a file of your Canadian Home Journal? It is worth it.

THE DENVER LECTURE.

But about the Radio Health Talks. The first one, so far as I know, was sent out from Denver. In that city the American Society for the Control of Cancer opened its Campaign in November 1921, by a lecture which was heard on the Pacific Coast.

In December 1921 the United States Public Health Service began to "broadcast" Health Talks from the Naval Radio Station at Washington. And on Friday evening March 24, 1922, at 7.40 p.m. the New York State Department of Health began to "broadcast" Health Talks from the Radio Station at Schenectady, N. Y.

ON WHAT SUBJECT.

On what subject would I send out a Radio Health Talk if I had the chance? That would depend partly upon the weather. In midsummer, 1921, the Family Physician wished that he had sent some health hints for hot weather to be printed in July, instead of the "Poison Ivy" article. But no one knew then how high the thermometer was going in July 1921.

The best that could be done then was to write out the hints when under the influence of the hot weather and put them away ready for 1922.

So here they are;—

"HEALTH HINTS FOR HOT WEATHER."

"Would I take a street car for a ride of a block and a half?" Of course I would—when the thermometer is 92° in the shade.

"Would I do it for 90°?" I think I would, that is if the humidity is as great as it was in the early part of July 1921 in this office.

YOUR FEELINGS.

"How do I keep well in hot weather?" Well, I'll tell you.

Avoid that "Feeling of Irritation" when it is hot. If you have a grievance then forget it till the hot weather is over—and you will find that you have forgiven it when the weather gets cool again. Don't get cross. Keep good-natured. It is easy to be displeased, but it is a great mistake. It makes you much hotter. When you are hot or hungry, it is easy to lose your temper. Don't you do it!

And don't feel too sorry for yourself. You are lucky. Canada is well-watered. Take a bath. Drink plenty of water. How would you like to live in India? Do you remember what Kipling says about the heat there?

How would you like to live in Washington? Did you see that in the summer of 1921 Congressman A. made a bet with Congressman B. that he would fry an egg on the steps of the Capitol and Congressman A. won the bet!

"It never gets so hot in England!" Doesn't it?—Do you know what the official English Heat Record is at Greenwich Observatory? Just 100° in the shade—under date of August 1911. So smile—and keep smiling.

GO SLOW.

Go slow. When you walk—count slowly—"L-e-f-t," "R-i-g-h-t." This is no time to make a record with your mind or body. Take your Time. Don't get "het up."

YOUR MEALS.

No—I am not advising you to stop eating. Get your necessary amount of good nourishing food. It is wonderful how much stronger and more cheerful you feel after a good nourishing meal.

Yes—You can take a light lunch at noon and your heavier meal when it gets cooler in the evening.

"What is the best lunch?" Milk of course, one pint of milk. Sip it in spoonfuls. I mean it. Spoonfuls. Milk is not a liquid food. It is a solid food. It is quite solid soon after you have swallowed it. If you want it to digest properly, sip it in spoonfuls, and then your Department of the Interior will not feel as if you had swallowed lead. I do not mean that you must actually use a spoon, but sip it slowly, taking not more than a teaspoonful at a sip and then the milk gets a chance to mix with the saliva and digestion goes on successfully. "What else?" Six soda biscuits if you like them. If they are fresh and crisp, they are quite the thing.

An old friend of mine who lived on a lovely farm near Niagara-on-the-Lake thirty years ago, used to make a delicious dessert when it was 100° in the shade, by counting out ten big china saucers in a row, one for each of the family and putting a fresh, new, crisp soda biscuit on each plate. Then she took the strawberry jam jar in one hand and a tablespoon in the other and dropped a tablespoonful of strawberry jam on the centre of each soda biscuit. Then she took the cream jug

Dull Headaches Bilious Attacks Sleeplessness

Why they occur and how to prevent them.

HHEADACHES, biliousness, inability to secure sound and refreshing sleep—these are but a few of the ways in which Nature tries to warn you that constipation may be menacing health—even threatening life itself.

A distinguished physician has stated that thousands, perhaps millions, of men and women have brought on themselves untold miseries by failing to eliminate promptly poisonous food waste; that they have shortened their lives and greatly impaired their efficiency and usefulness.

How May Constipation Be Overcome?

How may its recurrence be prevented? Not by the use of laxatives or cathartics, for, in the opinion of an eminent authority, an inestimable amount of injury is done by the use of these intestinal irritants, most of which provide temporary relief only, at the expense of permanent injury.

Science has found a newer, better way; a means as simple as Nature itself.

Lubrication

In perfect health a natural lubricant keeps the food waste soft. Thus it is easily eliminated. But when you are constipated, this natural lubricant is not sufficient.

To find something to take the place of this natural lubricant, leading medical authorities conducted exhaustive research. They have discovered that the gentle lubricating action of Nujol most closely resembles that of Nature's own lubricant. As Nujol is not a laxative it cannot gripe. It is not a medicine in any sense of the word—and, like pure water, it is harmless. These facts have led to its adoption in leading hospitals throughout the world for the treatment of constipation.

The lubricating action of Nujol has helped thousands of people to lengthen their days and wonderfully increase their capacity for usefulness, activity and enjoyment of life. Test Nujol yourself. For sale at any drug-store, or send coupon today for free sample.

Of course, one never knows what is coming next, in these topsy-turvy days, when radio concerts are springing up in the backyard and health talks from Boston are being thrown on the verandah. However, even in these highly unusual days, I was somewhat startled the other afternoon, when a highly-respectable navy-blue bathing suit, which I was examining, proceeded to throw out its chest and present a wonderful contrivance of life preserver and bathing attire united. In fact, it was a "union" suit which meant bathing and swimming:—with safety first. Concealed in the pocket of this navy-blue garment, was a small tube-like apparatus by means of which the suit could be made entirely buoyant. When inflated, this tube-like affair formed a miniature life-preserver which made learning to swim a matter of confidence and safety.

Araminta smiled coldly, when I told her with enthusiasm of this navy-blue suit with "inflatable" trimmings.

"I don't like the idea, at all," she said. "Suppose you inflated the thing too much and rose clear out of the water."

"I tell you, it's a bathing suit, not a hydroplane," was my undaunted reply. "There's no danger if you do rise out of the water. You'd just be blown across to Niagara."

"And land there in a bathing suit," said Araminta in scorn, "without so much as a tooth-brush or a hair-net as luggage. I don't believe in bathing in the lake, anyway. A nice, quiet tiled bath-room is ever so much better."

"There's nothing of the summer girl about you, Araminta. A plunge in a common or garden variety of bath-tub is not to be compared with a swim in Lake Ontario."

"Perhaps not," replied the lady calmly. "But it's cleaner and not so cold."

DAME Fashion has a curious way of playing her game and returning to old ways and modes. Those who have been alarmed—and sometime justly so—at the scanty and immodest attire which seemed to mock at the flame of clothing may console themselves with the reflection that much that seemed undesirable was a passing freak of fashion and would soon be discarded. We are to wear longer skirts, so I hear, and women are actually to have their backs covered when they wear evening gowns. So far as the skirt is concerned, we admit that the new fashion is more graceful than that which favored the up-to-the-knees skirt; but we do hope that the old-time dragging skirt, which swept the dust of the street into several inches of its hem, is not going to return. Gone forever, we trust, are the scavenger skirt and the heavy lining which made our daily dress a burden.

The sight of a new-fashioned cloak in a shop window, the other day, reminded me of the way Dame Fashion has of "travelling back." There was a graceful cape-like wrap of dull and rich black silk, edged with fringe about twelve inches deep:—a lustrous finish which would cost a pretty penny. Suddenly the years rolled away—a great many of them—and I was a small girl again, sitting in a dim old church, not hearing very much of the sermon, but admiring greatly a gentle lady who sat near and who wore just such a wrap over a grey silk gown. The fringe was long and soft and my small fingers often strayed in its direction and furtively stroked it, as I wondered if I should ever possess such a beautiful garment. Here it is again, the cape-like wrap, with the long fringe—but it does not seem such a magical mantle as it did long ago, for there are many, many changes between the days in the dim old church and these times of after-the-war.

THERE must have been a gala week in the bustling city of Brandon during the month of May. In these days of many and various strikes, surely no uprising has been more "striking" than that of the down-trodden teachers of Brandon, who arose, one dark morning, to find that their salaries had been reduced twenty-five per cent. At no time does a school-teacher receive a salary which may be considered enviable. Hence, the reduction of a teacher's salary is an insult not to be borne—and the pedagogues of Brandon properly resented this cutting treatment. They "struck," forcibly and promptly, and the rejoicing pupils went with them. Can you imagine anyone more popular with the small boy than the teacher who has struck and has thereby turned a holiday-maker? The paper informs us: "School children led by senior high school students parade the streets daily.....and dismissed school teachers are carried shoulder high through crowds whenever they appear."

The eighty-nine teachers of Brandon on their refusal to accept the reduction proposal, were dismissed by the Board of Trustees, and the members of this body are having some difficulty in scouring the prairie for emergency teachers. By the time this paragraph appears in print, the trouble may all be adjusted and the teachers may be properly happy and prosperous once more. The West is more generous than the East, in the matter of salaries to teachers—but, even there, the salary of the teacher will hardly stand a twenty-five per cent reduction. But what a perfectly wonderful holiday those girls and boys of Brandon will have enjoyed—something to remember for many a week of everyday work. In the meantime, the parents of Brandon must have been in somewhat of a quandary.

Camping days in the west

THE GIRL HE LEFT BEHIND

By Edith Erwin

Illustration by Frederick Anderson

BRUCE WEBSTER had gone up to the city to make his fortune. And Mary Louise Kenyon had gone back home (after the train had whizzed itself away into a dot on the horizon) to tend her mother's cottage fresh and bright, to write long, newsy letters—and once in a while a whimsically tender little note which she mailed blushing.

Bruce's letters came more than often.

"Miss you every moment, Mary Lou," or "It's not here in the city for May. The business girls wear dark clothes, mostly, which is proper for office wear, but I like to shut my eyes and see you standing by the train, all cool and white."

Tenderly Mary Lou patted the frills of her best summer dress. Two years old—it had been her graduating frock—and it wouldn't stand many more tubbings. But it would have to do a while yet.

June came in gayly. Mary Lou sang as she coddled her garden. The earth fairies loved her—her larkspurs were the first in town to bloom.

And then—Stella Anthony went up to the city, too!

That night Mary Lou sat long before her mirror, twisting and retwisting her soft hair into school-girl plaits. But she saw not the frank hazel eyes, beneath delicately traced brows, watching her. She was looking past them at black, black eyes—eyes which could be so melting—or so mocking!—behind their mesh of dark lashes.

Stella Anthony's eyes were famous far beyond the bounds of Springdale. It was said she had only to flutter them a time or two to draw a crowd on Main Street. Naturally, she never lacked for attention.

But somehow, she had always seemed to prefer—

"Oh, well—I suppose some folks are just made that way—with a hankering for anything which looks as if it might belong to some one else," said Mary Lou dearly, as she put out the light.

There was much news in Bruce's next letter. What do you think! His employer's son was a fraternity brother! A regular fellow, Joe. Invited him to a stag party next week.

And—oh, yes—whom do you suppose he met coming out of the office the other evening? A home town girl! It surely was good to see any one from home. A lucky coincidence, her passing that moment. She was so delighted—had been so lonely in the city.

Mary Lou let the letter flutter to the floor.

Coincidence! Lonely!

It was amusing, if one happened to be in the mood for amusement. Stella Anthony was perfectly capable of guiding the long arm of coincidence with her own firm hand.

STELLA ANTHONY soon got a position and a smart business wardrobe. All dark and plain—trust Stella Anthony to know the correct wear for every occasion—but well-tailored and expensive.

Mary Lou longed to go shopping, for the "Emporium" had an alluring display of summer gowns, and she stood long before the window.

"Oh—that darling pink dotted swiss!" breathed Mary Lou. (Once, in high school days, Bruce had loved a dotted frock she'd worn.) "If I could only take you home—you lovely."

Coldly, the "lovely" displayed a price tag.

"Twenty-five dollars! For a scrap of swiss and a few knots of pink ribbon!" gasped Mary Lou. "Oh, dear!"

Bruce's letters grew less frequent, but told of good times, for Joe was taking him to parties and the country club. But he didn't forget the old town. He and Stella compared letters and kept up with the news, he said.

Thereafter, Mary Lou's letters took on an impersonal tone, as well as a tremendous dignity. People didn't ask her about Bruce often now, but instead looked at her with pitying eyes which made her writhe inwardly.

"If I thought he really—intended—" Mary Lou told her pillow incoherently, "I wouldn't lift a finger! But n—nice boys are so unus—s—pecting. And some girls—are just born experienced. They know ex—actly how to—"

Meanwhile, Springdale heard much of Stella Anthony's good times. Going to fashionable society affairs, if you please—you could read about them next day in the papers.

It grew sultrier and Mary Lou dragged languidly about her garden. The fickle earth fairies seemed to have forgotten her, and the flowers drooped disconsolately.

"Mary Lou! I took you for a flower!" gasped Bruce. "By George, I didn't know my eyes were so starved."

"But there ought to be a way." Mary Lou dug her nails into her palms. "It isn't fair! And he—wouldn't really be happy—afterwards. Oh—I must find a way!"

Something inside of her set to work intently—seemed to whisper, "Don't give up yet. Don't give up yet."

MAYBE it was this something that led her to buy a once-favorite magazine one day. Mary Lou had stopped getting it, for she didn't like to read love stories any more. But she took it, anyway, and that night picked it up disconsolately.

The pages fell open at a story. Something made her begin it eagerly. Then she re-read it.

"Why—I wonder—" whispered Mary Lou. And she read it a third time. "They say men always like—" After which she resolutely took pen and ink, then ran out to mail a letter in the dusk.

Then, for the rest of the summer, Mary Lou was very busy in a mysterious sort of way. She had less time for visiting, but as this meant less time for answering embarrassing questions and for fretting over the past, present and future, it was a good thing for her.

Bruce got a vacation late in October. What a wonderful October, with afternoons of veiled gold when you could wear the pretty organdies and gingham you hated to put away.

Springdale was not surprised that Stella Anthony managed to get a vacation then, too.

Yet Mary Lou was remarkably unruffled by this later news. And there was a mystifying twinkle in her eye! It remained there, even when Bruce failed to come over the day he arrived, and the second day of his absence failed to entirely dim its light.

That afternoon, the gate at last opened to a familiar hand, a well-known footfall sounded—stopped—

Over in a corner of the garden was what might reasonably be taken for a chrysanthemum, one of those huge yellow, fringy ones. But never yet did chrysanthemums boast silken hose and buckled slippers.

"Mary Lou! I took you for a flower!" gasped Bruce. "By George, I didn't know my eyes were so starved."

Strolling down-town, they met Stella Anthony, in a good-looking navy taffeta.

it was, with Mary Lou nervously twisting her pink ribbons.

"The sweetest of all," was Bruce's verdict. "Mary Lou," he bent suddenly toward her. "Don't ever wear anything but those dainty, frilly things. A man—out in the world—likes to know there's a cool little island of a home somewhere, with somebody waiting. Somebody in soft, feminine things—" Then he stopped.

"I've no right to ask you. You're used to lovely things—it will be some time before I can afford—"

"Oh—if that's all the objection," said Mary Lou, brazenly.

Comfortably snuggled against his arm she told him, later in the evening.

"I wanted pretty things more this year than ever before. For—well, just because. But I couldn't afford any—and I wasn't trained to earn money. Then, one day, I read of a school, the Woman's Institute, in Scranton, Pennsylvania, that teaches girls and women, right in their homes, to sew. Just think what that means—one could have prettier clothes for a fourth the usual price."

"I just felt I could learn, for I wanted to, so badly. So I began the lessons. And, do you know—in a month I made a pretty morning dress? I made some things for mother and then some cunning rompers for neighbor children. This brought me enough money to buy my yellow organdy, and it was really easy to make. I've sewed a lot for friends (they say it's hard to find anybody who can) and more than paid for my course as I went along."

"My party dress cost only ten dollars—and I find party things are the easiest of all to make. I can cut and fit things perfectly, for I draft individual patterns. I've learned the little style-touches that mean so much—like that wool embroidery on my pink jersey dress. I can even make simple hats. I know how to make the prettiest bows and flowers for trimming. This winter I'm going to take the Millinery course, too." Mary Lou stopped for breath.

"You'll be the prettiest girl at the dances this winter," whispered Bruce. "Christmas, is it?"

WHAT Mary Lou did, you can do, too. There is not the slightest doubt about it. More than 140,000 women and girls in city, town and country have proved that you can quickly learn at home, in spare time, through the Woman's Institute, to make all your own and your children's clothes and hats or prepare for success in Dressmaking or Millinery as a business.

Remember that every claim made by the Woman's Institute is borne out by its six years of experience in successfully teaching dressmaking, millinery and cookery in the home. The Institute is now the largest woman's school in the world. Its growth has been made possible only because it has rendered a service worth many times its small cost to every student. The Governor of Pennsylvania considered its work so important that he personally presided at the dedication of its new building, and the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, in making the principal address, called the Institute "one of Pennsylvania's most valuable educational institutions."

THE Woman's Institute is ready to help you, no matter where you live or what your circumstances or your needs. And it costs you absolutely nothing to find out what it can do for you. Just send a letter, post card or the convenient coupon below to the Woman's Institute, Dept. 31-F, Scranton, Penna., and you will receive, without obligation, the full story of this great school that is bringing to women and girls all over the world, the happiness of having dainty, becoming clothes and hats, savings almost too good to be true, and the joy of being independent in a successful business.

Teeth You Envy Are brushed in this new way

Millions of people daily now combat the film on teeth. This method is fast spreading all the world over, largely by dental advice.

You see the results in every circle. Teeth once dingy now glisten as they should. Teeth once concealed now show in smiles.

This is to offer a ten-day test to prove the benefits to you.

That cloudy film

A dingy film accumulates on teeth. When fresh it is viscous—you can feel it. Film clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. It forms the basis of cloudy coats.

Film is what discolors—not the teeth. Tartar is based on film. Film holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to film, and very few escape them.

Must be combated

Film has formed a great tooth problem. No ordinary tooth paste can effectively combat it. So dental science has for years sought ways to fight this film.

Two ways have now been found. Able authorities have proved them by many careful tests. A new tooth paste has been perfected, to comply with modern requirements. And these two film combatants are embodied in it.

This tooth paste is Pepsodent, now employed by forty races, largely by dental advice.

Other tooth enemies

Starch is another tooth enemy. It gums the teeth, gets between the teeth, and often ferments and forms acid.

Nature puts a starch digestant in the saliva to digest those starch deposits, but with modern diet it is often too weak.

Pepsodent multiplies that starch digestant with every application. It also multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's neutralizer for acids which cause decay.

Thus Pepsodent brings effects which modern authorities desire. They are bringing to millions a new dental era. Now we ask you to watch those effects for a few days and learn what they mean to you.

The facts are most important to you. Cut out the coupon now.

IN our issue of last month, the first story, "The Blossoming"—was by Marjorie Pickthall, and, in this department, was a review of her new novel, "The Bridge," with a photograph of the author taken in one of the Victoria gardens which she loved so well. Scarcely had those pages been printed, when the news was received of Miss Pickthall's sudden death in Vancouver on April 19th. In all provinces of the Dominion were expressions of appreciation and homage to the gifted writer, whose genius was rightly described by Professor MacMechan of Halifax as "our sweetest singing voice."

The production of poetry and short stories kept on steadily, all of a highly imaginative quality, which slowly but assuredly won the writer recognition as one possessed of more than ephemeral talent. Miss Pickthall was fortunate in attracting the notice and interest of such critics as Professor MacMechan of Halifax, Sir Andrew Macphail of Montreal and Professor Pelham Edgar of Toronto, who were glad to recognize the unusual gift of this young writer.

In February, 1910, occurred the death of Miss Pickthall's mother, between whom and her poet daughter had existed, not only the deepest affection, but also a

To Marjorie Pickthall

By KATHERINE HALE

*The day you died, that April yesterday,
I was alone in sunny meadow places
When, turning a dark clump of wintry leaves,
I caught a glimpse of exquisite fresh faces Renewing Earth.*

*Then, thinking of another April day,
When you and I found bloom beneath the snow,
I sent you happy thoughts across the world
Not dreaming it the hour you were to go—
But yesterday.*

*Yet O, Not Lost, how many a year shall turn,
And youth and age, lonely for some bright way,
Shall sudden feel you on the face of Earth
And push back death, and pluck you like the may—Immortal Song.*

—Katherine Hale.

Marjorie Pickthall, the only child of Arthur C. Pickthall and his wife, Helen Mallard Pickthall, was born in England in 1883, and, at the age of seven years, came to Canada. For over twenty years, her residence was in Toronto, where she was a student at Bishop Strachan School. From a tender age, her literary gift was manifest, strangely rich and classic in one so young. At the age of fifteen, she wrote a story which won a prize in "The Globe," and two years later there appeared in the "Young People's Corner" of the "Mail and Empire" (to which she was a constant contributor) a poem entitled "Dawn," which won wide recognition for its lyric charm and original quality. The sensitiveness to color and melody, which always distinguished Miss Pickthall's writing, was shown poignantly in this song of the morning:—"O, keep the world forever at the Dawn!"

spiritual understanding which made the bereavement a crushing grief. In 1913, when "Drift of Pinions," Miss Pickthall's volume of poems, appeared, the dedication was to the memory of the one who had listened to the writer's earliest songs. In 1912, Miss Pickthall went to England, where she remained for nearly eight years. Her work both in poetry and prose, continued and became known to English publishers. The University Press of Montreal had published "The Drift of Pinions," and a few years later, these poems, with several additional contributions, were issued by the Oxford Press, Toronto, under the title, "The Lamp of Poor Souls." In the coming autumn, McClelland and Stewart, Toronto, will publish "The Wood-Carver's Wife" and other works. The poem which gives its title to this book was originally published in "The University Magazine," and was produced as a play last year at Hart House, Toronto.

A novel of most unusual and quaintly mediæval touch, "Little Hearts," was written by Miss Pickthall while she was in England, and was published in 1915 by Methuen. It is a tale of Jacobite days, but it seems to belong to still earlier times when chivalry was a ruling force. The story is of the slightest, but the exquisite language in which it is told makes it a tale to be remembered. It is a story of the realm of fantasy—quite remote from the strident world in which dwells the "best-seller."

In the month of March, Hodder and Stoughton, Toronto, published "The Bridge," a review of which appeared in this department for May. There was another work in preparation when the end came so suddenly to earthly hopes and plans. During the last few months, Miss Pickthall had made arrangements with several of the most prominent magazines in the United States for the publication of short stories:—and in England, also, her stories were in constant demand. Just as a fair future of literary work and rewards opened before this writer of many gifts, there came the end which might well be called untimely.

During the years of the war Miss Pickthall shared the anxiety and the service which all truly British women knew during that time of tragedy. Her little cottage near Salisbury was given up to Belgian refugees and she devoted herself for a time to various forms of war work. Comparatively slender was her literary achievement during those years of strife, but, on her return to Canada in 1920, there seemed a fresh impulse for creative work and the fiction recently written:—especially the stories which appeared in "The Century" last autumn—showed a broader sweep of imagination than ever displayed before. There was always, in poetry and prose, a certain exquisite quality which marked Miss Pickthall's work as craftsmanship of jewelled order. There was nothing careless—nothing inartistic. Hers was the choice of the "inevitable word," the rejection of the tawdry and insincere. Her familiarity with the best in literature kept her from following any "fashion" or cult in poetry and gave her a power of self-criticism which was of great value. There was shown, from her earliest writing, a striking kinship with the East, notably seen in "The Little Sister of the Prophet," "The Bridegroom of Cana" and "Kwan-non." Her earlier stories, such as "The Miracle Flower" and "A Worker in Sandalwood," have a symbolism decidedly Oriental in suggestion.

While she was born in England, Marjorie Pickthall may fairly be claimed as a Canadian:—as she called herself since her return to the country in which she spent most of her years. When she returned to Canada, Miss Pickthall went out to Victoria, a city whose picturesque charm made a strong appeal to her beauty-loving soul. The sea and the mountains were a joy to her imaginative nature and her latest stories show the influence exerted by their majesty. Among her poems is "Pere Lalemant," a picturesque account of the days of the Jesuit missionary, who played such a heroic part in the early history of Canada. "Frost Song" is a picturesque lilt of winter, with its colorful lines:

"Here when the bee slept and the orchis lifted
Her honeying pipes of pearl, her velvet lip,
Only the swart leaves of the oak lie drifted
In sombre fellowship."

Miss Pickthall's work is to be found chiefly in the volumes already mentioned; but it may not be amiss to say here that, as "Cousin Clover," she conducted the "Journal Juniors' Page" of this publication for a year, while she also wrote for a

A Guest Chamber At a Moment's Notice

EVERY apartment suite has a living room, but not all have a fully furnished, luxurious guest chamber, all ready at a moment's notice. That is an opportunity for hospitality denied to many a modern hostess in these days of crowded apartments and house scarcity.

Modern houses are also built very often with the idea of economizing space. The guest room of more spacious times seems to be quite often overlooked by architects and house builders nowadays. The consequence is that Mother comes to town for a little visit and has to stay at an hotel. Or your girlhood chum comes up from New York with a thousand things to tell you, and you daren't ask her to stay. You have no spare room to offer her, so you have to let her go.

What a joy a Kroehler Daven-O would be to you! It takes up not an inch more space than an ordinary davenport. It is just what your living room needs to make it luxuriously comfortable and attractive.

And, then some time when you want to invite a guest to stay, you simply open up the Daven-O and there you have a beautiful guest chamber all ready and prepared, with a full sized, comfortable bed, with patented folding metal bed frame and springs that cannot sag.

When the Kroehler Daven-O is folded there is nothing in its appearance to suggest its double purpose. And yet it conceals a thick, removable mattress and all the necessary pillows and bedding. When you open the Daven-O out, there is the bed all ready made up. It opens out with one motion at a gentle pull, everything being finely balanced and easy of action.

BEAUTIFULLY UPHOLSTERED

The Kroehler Daven-O is the last word in upholstery. Europe and America are ranged for tapestries and velours and plush coverings, genuine leather and clever leather substitutes. You may select a Kroehler Daven-O to harmonize with almost any scheme of decoration. You may choose from overstuffed styles or from Period designs with any wood finish—oak, mahogany, walnut, etc.

Prices vary according to styles, and requirements. Every Kroehler Daven-O is substantially made and honestly finished, inside and out.

Sold by leading furniture dealers throughout Canada. Ask to see it opened out, and look for the Kroehler trade mark. The Kroehler Booklet, showing different designs, free on request.

Summer Dishes

Now that the summer days are near and we are considering gingham gowns and lace hats, the subject of summer cookery also comes to the fore; and the drink which is cooling and the sandwich that is "different" are topics of timely concern. So, if you wish a bright page of culinary hints, just turn to our cookery department.

Use plenty of lather. Rub it in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips.

When thoroughly clean, wet hair fairly squeaks when you pull it through your fingers.

The final rinsing should leave the hair soft and silky in the water.

How to Shampoo Your Hair Properly

A Simple, Easy Way to Make Your Hair Beautiful

THE beauty of your hair depends upon the care you give it. Shampooing it properly is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

When your hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh-looking, soft and silky.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why discriminating women, everywhere, now use Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your hair look, just follow this simple method:

A Simple, Easy Method

FIRST, put two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water. Then wet the hair and scalp with clear warm water. Pour the Mulsified evenly over the hair and rub it thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length, down to the ends of the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly—always using clear, fresh warm water.

Then use another application of Mulsified, again working up a lather and rubbing it in briskly as before.

Two waters are usually sufficient for washing the hair, but sometimes the third is necessary.

You can easily tell, for when the hair is perfectly clean, it will be soft and silky in the water.

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage—and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months. Beware of imitations—be sure you get Mulsified. Look for the name Watkins on the package.

JUST as I am writing these words of would-be wisdom, I notice an item in the paper which says that a scientist of some kind has declared that we are to have a cold summer. Scientists are the fussiest folk, always thinking of something unpleasant to foretell. In one year they sit up and give us the disagreeable information that we are descended from the monkey. So, we go to the Zoo, survey the chattering creatures there and wonder to take place for a million centuries or so. We feel comparatively cheered and do not worry at all about how the Canadians of that remote future will stand the heat.

We refuse to believe this gloomy prophet who would persuade us to prepare for a thoroughly chilly summer, with a tendency to snow flurries. Last autumn, we were almost terrified by the many gloomy stories of conditions in the forest and on remote hill-sides which led some hunters if our ever-so-great-grandmother really looked like that. Then we are informed that the Earth is drawing nearer the sun and that we are likely to fall into that glowing body some day and become a bit of toast. time a department in the "Canadian Courier," entitled "The Shadow on the Dial."

In Vancouver, Miss Pickthall formed a close friendship with Mrs. Isabel Ecclestone MacKay, whose warm sympathy with her literary aims and whose sisterly kindness enhanced the happiness of her western sojourn. On the seventh of April there had been an operation, from which Miss Pickthall seemed to be rapidly recovering, when a sudden collapse brought her brilliant career to a close. The funeral service was held in the Church of St. Mary the Virgin in Toronto on April 26th., and in St. James Cemetery, beside the mother she loved so fondly, this singer of sweet songs was laid to rest, with laurel and rose and all the lovely blooms, so dear to her, covering the sod. The triumphant tenderness of Chopin's music, the stately ritual of the Church of England service, the touching tribute of Canon Hart, who had known Miss Pickthall from childhood, and the solemn chords of the "Dead March," played as the grey casket was carried from the church, made a suitable setting for the passing of such a poet.

There was something appropriate, too, in the sight of the flags which hung in the chancel, for there was a touch of the soldierly in this woman writer's heart and those banners meant much to the church in which those rites were said. The spirited side of this dreamer's genius is flung into one of her latest poems:

"If I should live again,
O God, let me be young,
Quick in sinew and vein,
With the honeycomb on my tongue,
All in a moment flung
With the dawn on a grassy plain,
Riding, riding, riding, riding,
Between the sun and the rain.
"If I, having been, must be,
O God, let it be so,
Swift and supple and free
With a long journey to go,
And the clink of the curb, and the blow
Of hoofs, and the wind at my knee,
Riding, riding, riding, riding
Between the hills and the sea.

With the memory of her reticent grace of personality, her exquisite gift of song may be linked her own lines:

"I shall not go with grief,
Whether you call me, whether you deny
The crowning vintage and the golden sheaf.
O April hopes that blossom but to close!
Give me one look, one look and so good-bye,
Red Rose."

We have never been very great garden-makers on this continent, though we are now commencing to understand all that the garden means and holds for human health and happiness. One question is the beginning of a nation ever really sees the garden in its right light, as quite the most practical and most profitable of possessions. It does not seem to be a part of the birth-throes of any nation. For first of all people must be fed and housed and clothed, and then beauty may come. As a matter of fact, beauty can and should come with all of these operations from the very start.

refuse to believe these interpreters of signs, and trust that June will still be June and bring us strawberries and roses. By the way, we do not care for this new fashion of rushing the season by displaying so many imported strawberries at alarming prices, before our own fruit has had time to show its rosy head. It is like the absurdity of straw hats in February and furs on a broiling day in August. However, if Fashion were not foolish, she would not be herself.

Perhaps you have heard that strawberry juice is good for the complexion. The report is quite correct, and long ago, beauties in Egypt and Persia are said to have understood the gentle uses of the strawberry when it came to touching up the skin of a fair lady, and to have made diligent use of it to give softness and color to the sallow complexion. There was a Roman lady of renown and beauty who used to have strawberry baths, for the later Romans brought the bath to a degree of luxurious development which we hardly know, superior, as we think we are, to the races of those days. The Romans, in fact, overdid the luxury of the rites of the bath, which ceased to become invigorating and was enervating in its last days. They built substantial baths, though, those ancient empire makers. To this day the remains of the Roman baths may be seen in certain parts of England. Indeed the fashionable town of Bath, a resort for all the beaux and belles in the later years of the Eighteenth Century took its name from its original purpose.

There is a modern use of the bath which means invigoration, as well as cleansing. The use of bath salts is becoming more common and is to be commended to all who like the refreshing influence of a salt bath. Of course, it is not as good as a plunge in the real and briny deep, but it is a good preparation for the day's work or a soothing experience after it is over. We are not content, as a rule, to limit ourselves to the use of coarse salt. Most modern users of the bath salt like a perfume—and here the bracing type is to be preferred. Geranium is pleasing and verbenia is stimulating. Carnation carries you off to an old-fashioned garden where clove pinks made the borders fragrant. Then, if you incline to the softer perfumes, there are violet, rose, lily-of-the-valley and heliotrope. The bottles, of course, are as attractively wrapped as perfume—and sometimes one suspects that the high cost of good looks may apply to the way things are done, in the way of "putting up."

THE LETTER BOX.

DOREEN. As you did not enclose a stamped envelope, I suppose you wish for a public reply, only. From what you say, you are pursuing a very wise course with your fair young face:—and I do not see that you could use anything more beneficial than the soap and cream that you are now employing in their cleansing and softening service for the skin. For the blackheads, after they have been banished from the cheeks and the brow, dab the spot, where once they encamped, with eau de Cologne. Two ounces of rose water and three drops of tincture of benzoin will make a good astringent lotion. Use twice a day.

MARGARET. So you wish to know how to acquire rosy cheeks. Well, avoid an overdose of candy, and eat fruit and vegetables every day. Take exercises which will keep the circulation in good order and be sure to sleep with the window up—or down. Do not indulge in too much tea or coffee. I believe that diet has more to do with rosy cheeks than any other measure we can take. The sallowness which comes upon us as we grow older is due to our forsaking the simple diet of our childhood and resorting to "fancy foods." You might try some of those yeast cakes which are having such a beneficial effect on many citizens. You know, vitamins play an important part in the encouragement of color in the cheeks, as well as in the general condition of "fitness."

How a mother's ignorance of certain facts

Free to Mothers

By the Head of the Research Laboratories of Bauer & Black

WHAT should a mother look for when a healthy baby is cross and fretful?

Modern baby specialists now point to the fact that 3 babies in 5 suffer the hidden discomfort of diaper rash, or other form of skin irritation.

It is those disorders, they say—often imperceptible to the mother's eye—which are responsible for more cross and restless babies than any other disturbances of infancy.

The purpose of the following is to explain, in simple terms, the cause of baby rash and skin irritations and to offer mothers, free and postpaid, liberal test packages of a new and radically different way to overcome them.

This new preparation was perfected in the Bauer & Black Laboratories, for 28 years specialists in filling doctors' wants. It is called B & B Baby Talc, and embodies principles based upon the experience, in daily practice, of more than 100 baby doctors, dermatologists and heads of maternity homes.

Highest authorities urge all mothers to try it, for it marks a new era in infant hygiene. Simply mail the coupon below, and soon your baby will be enjoying the soothing comfort it brings.

Important Facts Mothers Should Know

The pores of a baby's skin constantly exude moisture. It is nature expelling impurities from the body.

Upon exposure, this perspiration becomes a semi-acid irritant. So does urine, but more intensely so. These acids make the skin raw, tender, susceptible to rash. Infection often follows. Urine scald is sheer torture—yet few babies escape it.

Hence the problem, as your doctor will tell you, is to combat these acids — to make them harmless to the skin.

Now We Combat These Acids

B & B Baby Talc goes to the basis of preventive skin treatment. It combats the irritant acids of perspiration and of urine—makes them harmless to the skin.

This is a new effect: the result of months of research work in our laboratories. Old-time methods failed to achieve it. They aimed merely to dry the moisture—did not effectively combat the acids.

Thus B & B Baby Talc strikes at the cause of irritation. Discomfort is prevented. Present irritation is allayed. Results are quick and amazing. Thousands of mothers will tell you this. Tell you, too, from practical experience, that this new way not only makes baby's days happier, but mother's days less trying.

How To Use It

Simply apply B & B Baby Talc after baby's daily bath. Then sprinkle it freely on diaper cloths, on all garments that come in contact with the skin. Where irritation is already present, apply three or four times a day to the affected parts.

A Soap, Too!

B & B Baby Soap is offered for use in place of those soaps, strong in caustics, which tend to cause irritation. It is made of edible fats, lathers freely and rinses off readily. A slight percentage of zinc oxide makes it gently healing—a safe soap for the nursery. It is tempered to the infant's skin.

Mail Coupon for Free Samples

So that all mothers may know this way to baby comfort, liberal trial packages of B & B Baby Talc and B & B Baby Soap will gladly be sent free and postpaid—simply mail the coupon.

3 Babies in 5 Suffer This Hidden Discomfort

Recent investigations show that 3 in 5 healthy babies are fretful and cross because of skin irritations in one form or another.

The cause of these disorders has been learned and is now successfully combated. Noted baby specialists and prominent maternity hospitals are employing a new way, which is fully explained elsewhere on this page.

It places at mothers' disposal the most recent discoveries of modern scientific research in overcoming diaper rash, skin irritations and urine scald.

RADIO TELEPHONY

A Miraculous Means for the Transmission of Music and Other Forms of Sound Which Has Taken the World by Surprise

BY HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

THE man of fifty or sixty years has within his recollection witnessed so many miracles that one hundred years ago would have been regarded as mad imaginings that it should be almost impossible for anyone to be astonished by anything. The inventive genius of many goes ahead achieving the impossible at such a pace that it seems unwise to be skeptical about anything. Telephones, horseless vehicles, flying machines,—all sorts of devices for the conquering of time and space have become so much the commonplace of ordinary existence; that one can only ask "What Next?" and admit that nothing is impossible. What, for instance, would our grandmothers have said if anyone had told them that within a few years, physicians would take photographs of folks' interiors? Nevertheless, these modern miracles do take us unawares when they first come to pass; and I think most of us who live in cities are still a little bewildered with regard to radio telephony. When the last snows were on the ground nobody in Canada was giving "the radio," as it is called for short,—a thought. Now everyone is talking about it and it is making its way into countless homes. In every large city some newspaper is giving radio concerts for the benefit of the public. Everywhere one hears of developments to make it an adjunct to the practical affairs of life, as well as a source of entertainment.

Personally the attention of most of us has been chiefly aroused, by the capacity of the new discovery, for the transmission of music; but the invention has so many other possibilities that it would be dwarfing the subject to deal with it exclusively from that point of view. In my own city of Toronto, interest in hearing concerts in other cities by means of radio has become so intense as to seriously detract from the attendance at concerts where the public can see the artists face to face, and catch their tones before they have travelled through the ether. The comparative ease and cheapness with which receiving instruments can be installed, has led to their use by innumerable families, especially those in which there are boys of a mechanical turn of mind; so that private radio entertainments have become a means of diverting guests at evening parties great and small. The radio has also become a news feature of the evening journals in nearly every large city of this continent. Nightly the alphabetical combinations which signify the wave lengths required to get the radio distributing centre at some other city are published. Tune your machine for "W.P.L." (say) and you are in touch with a concert or lecture at Newark, N.J. hundreds of miles away. Here for instance is a newspaper announcement clipped at random from a Toronto newspaper toward the end of April:

"From 8.30 to 10.30 to-night a high-class musical programme will be broadcasted by the Winnipeg Tribune on a wave-length of 400 metres. The Tribune has asked that any Toronto fans who hear the concert send collect wires stating what they think of it. No call sign has yet been assigned to this station."

Here we have an item published without display, like the announcement of a concert or lecture in the next block,—just an ordinary occurrence of life, this "listening in" on a concert at Winnipeg, which cannot be reached from Toronto under the fastest modern travel conditions in less than thirty-six hours. Such are the daily miracles which six months ago were undreamed of by all except a few who took an interest in electrical developments. The other night I was at a little affair and most of those present wished to listen to a concert in Philadelphia; but for some reason the atmosphere was intractable and it was difficult to get anything intelligible out of the Quaker City; so it was decided to listen to a concert by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra in its home town, and it sounded very well. In a few months this sort of thing will be as ordinary an occurrence as riding in a motor car. Yet a good many of us still recall quite freshly our first ride in a motor car and what an exciting and novel experience it was.

ALL this has, as it were, come upon us like a thief in the night. As recently as January last, a young tenor singer, John Steel, who had been filling engagements in Canada, casually told me that on Christmas day he had sung carols to nearly all the sailors of the American navy at that time on the Atlantic, from a high powered wireless telephone station in New Jersey. Responses had come showing that his voice was heard not only in the mid-Atlantic but off the West Coast of Scotland, in the Caribbean Sea and the coast of South America below the equator. It had also been heard on land at stations on the East slope of the Rockies, though the sound waves had apparently failed to cross those elevations to ships on the Pacific. I then assumed that the device by which this was accomplished was restricted to the use of the American navy; and had no thought that by early spring, music would be in course of wireless transference to millions of people in the cities of Canada and the United States. Unquestionably newspaper enterprise, begun in journals like the New York "Globe" and adopted later by progressive publications everywhere has been responsible for the recent popular developments. "Broadcasting" is a phrase coined to describe this process.

In scientific journals, allusions to the new system of carrying music and other sounds vast distances have been frequent during the past decade. Wireless telephony was the logical sequence of wireless telegraphy, first brought into general use as a result of the experiments of Signor Marconi and Admiral Sir Henry Jackson of the British Navy nearly twenty years ago. In America, Dr. Lee de Forrest, one of the pioneers in the field of wireless, began experiments in radio telephony at least fifteen years ago, and Earl Hanson was also a pioneer in the work. These experiments were carried on chiefly on the Pacific Coast. As early as 1916 John McCormack, the tenor, and Charlie Chaplin, the movie actor, were asked to participate in efforts at broadcasting. The real work of perfecting broadcasting, that which has rendered radio distribution of music in its present form possible is credited to another inventor, Edwin H. Armstrong; and his claims have been sustained by the United States Court of Appeals in connection with litigation between himself and Dr. de Forrest. Armstrong invented a system of regenerative action by which the sound wave carrying musical tones perpetuated themselves instead of fading away like ripples in the water, to which radio distribution holds a distinct analogy, and also a "feed-back" arrangement in the reception and transmission of radio tones, which, with the assistance of amplifiers that look very much like ordinary phonograph horns enables large audiences to hear music from enormous distances. No trans-Atlantic wireless telephone conversation can be carried on without use of the Armstrong principle; none of the big radio-phone broadcasting stations now sending music nightly through the air can operate except under the Armstrong patent. Admittedly his discoveries are responsible for the present radio craze.

Writers who have investigated the matter regard radio telephony as one of the compensations for the losses of the great war, which despite its ravages gave a tremendous stimulus to invention and research in all the sciences. The leading countries engaged in the war were eager to improve all possible means of communication, and it was because of this desire that the wireless telephone ceased to be an obscure scientific curiosity. It was for war purposes not merely necessary to diffuse messages through the ether but to devise instruments that would enable them to be received in code at the spot for which they were destined. Receiving rather than sending was the problem that had to be

Odds and Ends

Everyone who has read those classics of girlhood, Louisa M. Alcott's "Little Women" and "Little Women Married," will remember the first quarrel which Meg had with that estimable husband, John Brook. The latter came home, when Meg was tired and cross after a long, hot day in the kitchen:—and, worst of all, John had brought a man home to tea. Meg, in a flood of tears, explained her day-long troubles:—"the jelly wouldn't jell." Of course John laughed and then Meg lost or mislaid her usually sweet temper and there was a real tempest in a jelly-jar.

The modern Meg is not troubled so greatly as the Meg of yesterday over the uncertain ways of jelly:—for the simple reason that there are now ways of stiffening jelly—giving it the necessary "substance," as it were, which would make the Meg Brook of long ago open her eyes very wide.

Science has turned its attention to the kitchen and has given us the fireless cooker, the electric range, the washing-machine which can be "turned on" or off, and now comes the bottle of magic liquid which makes the jams, jellies and marmalades firm and satisfying, bestowing just the dash of pectin which the sweeter fruits need. Pectin, in which the crab-apple is so rich, is very much needed by the raspberry, the peach and the strawberry. A way has been found to supply this pectin prop to the fruits in need of it:— and housewives can now be certain of perfect jelly and jams and marmalades which are more toothsome than ever before. This new preparation has given a fresh joy to the making of fruit delicacies.

Muslin is a fabric which has always been popular with those who rejoice in summer attire, and the "white muslin girl" was dear to the heart of the old-time novelist. The flowing skirt may return to us and muslin once more comes into its own. There is a town across the sea, Tarare, in east-central France, which is called the city of muslins. It was formerly a little village, lost in the Beaujolais Mountains, but now it is the centre of a thriving industry. For more than half a century it has conducted a world-wide trade in the finest muslins, the secret of making which originally came from India; and as a result of that trade the little village has become famous. Each year, in honor of Simonet, the founder of the mills, the people celebrate the Muslin Festival, which calls forth the liveliest holiday spirit in all of the inhabitants.

Last year the festival lasted three days, during which the little city was truly a city of muslin. Everywhere houses, balconies and facades all but disappeared under the light and colorful decorations, which were always pretty and sometimes ingenious. Above the middle of the streets were suspended domes, from which long streamers of muslin were draped in graceful curves to the second-floor windows of the houses; reseda, cream, ivory and rose predominated, gay and beautiful colors, like garlands of flowers hanging from immense corals. Vehicles of all kinds were adorned with fancy muslins, and gave the scene a brilliancy such as bright flowers give to the festivals of southern California.

Many people live with ugly surroundings, year after year, looking forward to a time when wonderful changes are to be made. Begin today. Don't wait for that happy but vague future when you expect to have all the old mahogany you want and a real garden. Start a window box and take stock of the furniture. If the success of a story lies in what is left unsaid, the success of a room no less consists in what it does not contain. Put in one pile the things you cannot live without, place in a second what remain. Note the difference in the two piles, the ratio may be as the mole hill to the mountain, says a Boston housewife.

Have you ever noticed how refreshing and attractive a room seems after it has been carefully cleaned and before the pictures and so-called ornaments have been put back? Possibly you stop to rest, surveying the scene with satisfaction. The walls are unadorned, the tops of the tables as are bare as a historic cupboard. Perhaps you do not analyze your pleasure. You attribute it to that shining quality which is ranked next to godliness rather than to the inevitable bric-a-brac awaiting a second dusting.

You may not realize it, but this moment is a critical one. It is what our dear old-time clergymen would call a turning point. That they knew nothing of the decorative problems that beset the soul of modern women makes no difference with the comparison.

Sometimes, when I am being shown over the domain of a brand new housewife, I am conscious of a great lack in her equipment, says Caroline B. King. There are plenty of tables and chairs, pictures and bric-a-brac; friends have seen to it that she has an ample supply of linen and enough silverware to stock a small hotel; there are lamps and clocks, and cushions of all kinds and descriptions; perhaps there is even a smart little car in the smart little garage at the back of the house. The kitchen range is all that even an old and seasoned housekeeper could desire, and shining pots and pans stand in neat rows on the shelves of the neat pantry, but not a single book pertaining to the profession of housekeeping is visible in any room of the cunning abode.

"Cookery books?" she may reply smilingly to my question, "O, I feel that our meals will be so simple for a long time, that I have not even thought of a book to tell me how to prepare them."

But this is all wrong, at least, in my opinion. Not only should a good standard book on cookery be given a prominent place in every kitchen, but a whole shelf of not too meager proportions should be relegated to the literature of the kitchen. I know of many housewives, excellent in their line, I must admit, who possess no books whatever on the important profession which is theirs. They get along as best they may, sometimes achieving wonderfully satisfactory results, but seldom finding it possible to secure the same success twice in succession.

Of course a great deal depends upon the season both as to food and dishes, says a writer on "Attractive Dishes." In general, brighter colored dishes are more cheerful in winter and daintier hues are more enjoyable in hot weather. Glassware, especially, is attractive for the summer table, as it is cool looking. Even cocoa, coffee and desserts can be contrived to be served in glassware. The plain puddings of rice or bread, indeed, garnished with fruit or jelly, or accompanied by sauce, look far more attractive served in glass punch-cups or sundae glasses, than in the usual saucers. Glass saucers, however, are useful for cereal, fruit and even salad. Prunes in gold banded goblets of glass, topped with whipped cream or marshmallow, are very alluring, while all fruits, ices and gelatines look refreshing in glassware. The large variety of glassware manufactured nowadays, from cooking ware to the exquisite Venetian glass designed for beverages, fruit, bonbons, finger bowls and flowers, makes it possible to serve practically everything in glassware if so desired. Pie and casserole recipes can, indeed, be served right from the oven to the table. And as glass is often reserved for company use only, why not surprise the family occasionally with a pleasing change?

solved, as anyone will see. I am not versed in mechanics, electricity or radio science but I shall try to make clear to lay readers like myself, something of what happens when Toronto "listens in" on a Winnipeg "broadcasting" station, or vice versa

Every time you speak, sing, laugh, play on a musical instrument or make a noise of any kind, you set in motion a series of sound waves that reaches the ears of those within range and vibrates on their ear drums in "tune" with the vibrations that originated with this noise. Radio telephony consists in increasing the radiation of sound waves to cover a vast circumference, hundreds, or it may be thousands of miles in diameter. If you throw a stone in a pool or drive a motor boat through the water you start in motion a series of ever widening waves. Something like this happens when a sound is loosed in the ether by which we are surrounded. Now suppose a mysterious force in nature by which ripples could be driven immensely greater distances so that a stone thrown from a steamer in mid-Atlantic, would result in splashing on the shores of both Europe and America and you have an idea of what radio telephony accomplishes in air. By the processes that originated with Marconi sound waves are given such force and velocity that they travel immensely greater distances than they do in nature. The problem of hearing them properly, remains. The receiving apparatus is a great ear which takes the sounds and amplifies them in "tune" with the original sound. The waves from the transmitter set up vibration in the circuits of the receiving stations, and to preserve their original identity the receiving circuits must be pitched to the same wave-length as the transmitting station. It was necessary to devise some means of "detecting" these waves, or in other words translating them back to the original sound as heard at the point of departure.

EXPERIMENTAL scientists, after long research, found that certain substances, known as mineral crystals, possessed qualities which enabled them to function as "detectors" of radio waves, because of certain special qualifications they possess as conductors of electricity. Galena is the most important of these mineral crystals, and, after the current reaches it, it ceases to oscillate, and travels in one direction. The crystal is in use in some of the more simple receiving machines which take the sound and repeat it like the ordinary telephone. But more scientific and efficient than the crystal is the "audion" or "vacuum tube" detector, and it is this familiar object (first invented by the late Sir William Crookes,) utilized in a new way that has made the present grand developments of radio telephony possible. It is like an incandescent light bulb with a plate mounted in the bulb, in addition to the filament. The plate is charged with positive current and the current from the filament flows in one direction only—toward the plate. Thus by connecting the bulb in such a way that incoming signals go first to the filament, they are immediately steadied and flow against the plate, which transmits them as does a telephone either to an individual Head 'phone, or through an amplifier,—a simple device,—to large audiences.

"Tuning in" is not quite so easy to explain to unscientific persons, but it has to do with the length and number of vibrations, and vibrations have everything to do with the ordinary and unthought mysteries of sight and hearing. One writer goes to colors for an illustration. We speak of this color as blue and another as red. In the scale of vibrations the color blue is higher in pitch than red. The number of waves per second required to show red to the eye is not so great as in the case of blue. Similarly with the voice. A note is "High" or "Low" in accordance with the frequency of the waves or vibrations per second that produce it. Thus when you hear a high soprano sing, you will frequently experience a sudden rapid pulsation against the ear drums which is entirely absent when a contralto sings. The same principle applies to radio telephony. Every sound that issues from the transmitting station goes out on a certain wave-length, determined by the amount of capacity and strength of current-production (or inductance) in the sending circuit. The receiving operator in "tuning" tried various degrees of capacity or inductance until they correspond with the wave lengths of the transmitter. To facilitate radio telephony, the wave lengths to be used at broadcasting stations are telegraphed to the newspapers in advance, so that the receiving operator need lose no time in adjusting his apparatus to hear from a given point with which he desires to establish communication. Within a few weeks a superb system of organization for the interchange of intelligence on radio programmes has been created. Given an elementary knowledge of electrical appliances and mechanics the home construction and management of radio receiving machines is open to nearly everyone. For a simple treatise on this subject, I would recommend "The Home Radio; How to Make and Use It" by A. Hyatt Verrill, Published by Harper & Bros., New York and the Musson Book Company, Toronto.

The widespread popularity of the radio has raised a question which scientists regard as serious, but which seems fantastic to the layman; Can the air stand the use which is being made of it? Recently a convention of experts was held at Washington called by Hon. H. C. Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, at the instance of President Harding, to discuss this very issue. As the Scientific American put it; "The use of the ether—the name given to the medium through which the radio waves travel—is not limitless. It will accommodate just so many wireless messages and no more. When this limit is exceeded, chaotic conglomerations of sounds, which rival the busy day noise in a boiler factory, prohibit the sending or receiving of any kind of messages. Naval and military authorities and those who wish to use the new device for strictly utilitarian ends were alarmed at the enthusiasm of boys who are everywhere making receiving sets for home use, for it is certain that by summer there will be a million such machines in American homes. Secretary Hoover was the staunch friend of the boys however, although sentiment was in favor of some form of regulation. I, passing it should be said that such machines are already subject to regulation in Canada. It is not legal to install a machine without securing a license from the Navy department at Ottawa, which cost one dollar.

There are some who predict that the radio telephone is a mere toy, interest which will subside. That is possibly true so far as cities are concerned; but it will continue to be a great boon for the farm and villages. And it has elements of utility far exceeding mere radio concerts. Here are some of the uses to which it is being put in the United States, gleaned from casual items in the press. The U.S. Public Health Service is broadcasting health hints in certain rural sections and the same course will probably be followed in England and France where broadcasting is now established. Medical advice on emergency cases at sea is being transmitted to ships. Market prices are being sent to farmers, and weather reports also. Not merely music and lectures, but crop reports, official time, racing, and baseball returns, shipping news and many forms of commercial intelligence are now going broadcast through the air free to anyone who possesses a wireless receiving set. Obviously an invention with so many applications can never become a mere toy. "Take away your toy" was what Prof. Graham Bell heard forty years ago from countless wise acres when he was trying to secure financial backing for the original telephone.

MANITOBA WOMEN'S INSTITUTES CONVENTION

Manitoba Women's Institutes held their twelfth annual convention at Winnipeg recently, with two hundred and fifty delegates present. These were welcomed by Lady Aikins, Mrs. Robt. Forke of Pipestone replying.

According to the report of Miss Myrtle Hayward, director of Women's Institute work, ten new branches had been organized, last year, making a total membership of over 3 500.

The aggregate expenditure was $27,000, by far the larger part of which went to the community, though in a few cases donations were made to the Children's Aid, Winnipeg, the Fresh Air Camp at Gimli, the needy in other provinces and in one case, money was contributed to relief in Europe.

Eight institutes spent in the aggregate $2,111.63 on community halls and their furnishings; four spent $710.00 on rinks, and four gave $594.00 toward hospital supplies.

Rest rooms were maintained at 25 different centres, the money spent in their upkeep amounting to $3,180. In most cases these rest room were financed entirely by the Institutes. In a few cases rural municipality and the town council contributed a substantial annual grant. In five instances cash donations amounting to a total of $75.00 were made towards Christmas trees, boxes and presents. Included in other activities were interests in Boys' and Girls' Clubs, equipping playground for children, millinery and dress-making short courses and the establishment of child welfare stations.

In order to get an idea of the many worthwhile deeds of the Institutes, it is necessary to study their reports very closely. Committees call regularly on the sick and those in trouble; clothing is solicited, made over, and sent off to the needy; receptions are given for new-comers in the community; "glad hands" offered to the stranger within the gates; Christmas cheer carried to lonely hearts; and assistance given to teachers in Canadianizing foreign children. These are the things that are remembered but can not be counted in dollars and cents.

As the resolutions of any convention sum up its business and the subjects of discussion—so a brief record of these will show just what the Manitoba W. I. is doing. They are as follows:

That the pre-school clinic scheme be encouraged by the W. I. and adopted wherever possible.

That, whereas, sub-section 2 of section 156 of The Canada Temperance Act enacts that no poll for polling or voting, whether for bringing into force any prohibition or for the revocation of the same, shall be held or had within three years of any previous voting held or had under the provisions of this part; therefore be it resolved that the will of the people has been fully and unmistakably expressed upon the question, and that until the amendments to The Canada Temperance Act have been given the test of at least three years' sympathetic administration, we are opposed to any further attempts to question the decision already emphatically expressed, and that we use our influence against any propaganda intended to modify the present legislation.

That we express our satisfaction with the stand taken by the present government on the temperance question.

That there should be equal parental rights as between husband and wife and the safe-guarding of the rights of children.

That the Mother's Allowance Act be extended to include the wife and family of a man who is permanently disabled and incapable of contributing to the support of his family.

That the federal government be asked to take such necessary steps as will permit the free testing of all herds from which milk is used for human consumption.

That there should be suitable ceremony when people of other countries are being made naturalized citizens of Canada, on July 1 or some other suitable date.

That the Municipal Act be amended so that the women in towns and villages may have the same franchise rights as regards municipal by-laws as the women on farms.

A Silver Touch for the Hope Chest

Of course you know what the hope chest is:—not the box which Pandora opened and from which the blessings flew away, "excepting hope," but a practical, capacious chest into which the bride puts linen and lingerie and many a dainty hoarding for that new life which is to be so much like the Garden of Eden—with a house in the centre of it.

As the days go by, the hope chest becomes quite crowded with towels almost silky in their fineness, table linen which has a texture and sheen that are a delight to the housewifely heart:—and then silver dreams begin to come to the bride—who-is-to-be and visions of tea-sets and shining dozens of spoons brighten the hours given to drawn-work and monograms.

Spoons are, perhaps, the first suggestion in silver. There will be some readers who will murmur a pun just here, but we insist on considering spoons with seriousness. We do not know when they were first made:—but we have a fancy that they were made of leaves and then of wood.

silversmith's art. In fact, we have many designs to-day which have delighted the brides of three or four generations and which will probably light the pathway of the young housewife for many years to come. The choice of silver is a continued story and we find great grandmother describing with enthusiasm the silver teapot which was given her when Victoria was a young queen.

IN Canada, the use of a variety of table silver has increased greatly in the last twenty years. The soup tureen of silver was a comparatively rare article in the household of 1890. To-day it is frequently seen, while the casserole and the silver baking dish are almost indispensable. The silver platter and the chop dish are also in popular favor, while the silver gravy dish makes a graceful receptacle, which cannot be exceeded in any other ware. The silver or glass butter dish has been a feature at every wedding since butter was first rolled and stamped.

This shows an interesting variety of silver articles, any one of which would be a welcome gift. Upper (from the left): a syrup jug, a candlestick and a marmalade jar. Lower: salad bowl, butter dish and biscuit jar. These articles are all dainty in style and excellent in quality; something to brighten and adorn the table, with a daily usefulness as well.

The horn spoon, the ivory spoon, the silver spoon and the rare spoon of gold played their part in history, in varying sizes and shapes. The silver spoon finally established itself as favorite, and the desire of every bride is to have a complete equipment of spoons:—tea, dessert, table, grapefruit—and any other fancy varieties which may come along. The modern manufacturer of silver-ware has produced the spoon in many designs and styles:—and the friends of the bride-elect would do well to give heed to her individual taste, in selecting the spoons which are to be useful and ornamental in her new abode. She may like a touch of flowers or leaves in her silver spoons or she may prefer the simple or almost classic lines. So, try to discover her preference in spoons and the bride will give you a double blessing. Do not have the monogram or initials engraved:—for each fair lady prefers a style of letter all her own. Of course a cabinet of silver with a presentation engraving is another story, which has a little silver shield or panel to itself.

Most brides have a few spoons in their store which have come down to them from mother and grandmother:—heirlooms which are justly prized; but none of them can surpass the modern products of the

No wedding outfit would be complete with the butter-dish absent. The crumb set is also a looked-for friend, while the sandwich plate and the bread tray are requisite in every household. The daintiest designs are shown in these, with perforated patterns, which make a pleasing tracery for border and ends.

The silver present affords a solid satisfaction to both giver and receiver. It cannot well be broken, and, therefore, can be displayed proudly, twenty-five years from now, when the silver wedding-day arrives with reinforcements for the cabinet and the spoon drawer. There is something so shingly substantial about silver that it is well to buy the best that one can afford to bestow on the bride. It is more satisfactory to give a smaller piece of good quality plate than something more imposing in size which is not of such fine type. Good silver is an acquisition:—something to be regarded as a generation-long possession. Like old lace, it may be "handed down," with the assurance that it will be appreciated.

There is a comforting feature about many of the modern silver dishes:—and that is their comparative lightness. The

The Bride That Wonderful Girl!

SHE deserves the best there is. The best that her parents, her brothers and sisters, her relatives and friends can give her. Such a lot depends on the start she gets on the broad sea of matrimony. The test comes when she starts to cook for the man who won her heart. Consider carefully, then, all you who are about to choose a gift for the bride. Select a gift that will make her task a delight.

Give her a MOFFAT as a Wedding Gift

WHY? A Moffat Range has a very wonderful oven, for instance. It is porcelain enameled inside and out. It cannot rust. Corrosion is impossible. It is made all in one piece and it is electrically welded, so that no weaknesses can develop. The Moffat oven is easily cleaned—cleans like glass! It is perfectly ventilated, absolutely sanitary and indestructible.

On the oven door is a mercury thermometer which tells the exact degree of heat within the oven. And in this Moffat wonder oven there are no copper wire connections.

Then the burners! They are made of indestructible cement porcelain, and can't be injured. Moffat burners will boil water or cook food faster than any other electric range—boil a quart of water in ten minutes from cold to the full boil! Protected Moffat elements can be installed where ordered.

The switches on Moffat Electric Ranges are all clearly named on the outside. The switches are protected from moisture and accident and are well away from the burners.

In the Moffat you have the perfect electric range—ready for any job of baking, frying, broiling, stewing, roasting, grilling, boiling. There are 28,000 Moffats in daily use. Write for complete details and illustrated booklet to Moffats, Limited, Weston, Ontario.

A Silver Touch for the Hope Chest

huge and heavy articles which our forefathers liked are out of place in the house or flat of this crowded century. Consequently silver-ware has gained in grace and the silver centre-piece or vase of to-day is much more attractive than the massive epergne of long ago. The dainty silver, so much in vogue at the present, is better suited to our requirements than the rather clumsy tea pots which were popular one hundred years since. We make our silver to suit our houses, after all, and the old-time ponderous pieces are not at home in the modern citizen's habitation.

* * *

A COMPLETE set of table silver is something which any bride might well desire to possess. Years may come and go, fashions change and pass, but the silver tea set is always a favorite gift bride's domain:—and you may take your choice of silver, ebony or ivory handles for the coffee-pot.

In the matter of choosing dainty silver articles, which yet have a use of their own, we are much more fortunate than our grandmothers. There is a variety in the display of to-day which affords satisfaction to every kind of buyer. If you wish to bestow a gift of a tiny silver basket which will hold a few almonds or candied violets, you will find many such articles in filagree effect gleaming in the cases. If your heart is set on a slender silver vase here is just the thing to hold a rose or two or a few sprays of sweet peas. There are bon-bon dishes of graceful shape, tempting one by their shining beauty to partake of the sweets they hold. Pie plates and casseroles supply more practical for the bride. Five o'clock tea, too, has almost become a Canadian custom, and there is more need and use than ever for the silver tea set. There is no position a young wife can hold which is more dignified and becoming than that of priestess of the tea-pot. The bridal silver equipment which does not include a tea set has failed to meet the demands of the new home, and the young hostess will not be truly happy until it is added to her list. The coffee set, too, is conducive to happiness in the silver department of the needs, while thimbles, talcum holders, tea-pot stands, fern jars (looking as if they were intended for one of fairy growth) trays six-inches long and diminutive jugs appeal to the purchaser whose purse is not equal to a tea set or a water jug.

You cannot complain of a lack of variety in the scene where silvery gifts are displayed. There is everything which the heart or fancy of womankind may desire;—and you can hardly make a mistake, if you would express your best wish in tangible form, if you say it in silver.

THE SUMMER DELEGATES.

“EVERY woman here has made good in the work she specially represents on the Departmental Lecture Staff,” said the Superintendent of the Ontario Women's Institutes addressing the Workers' Conference held in the Parliament Buildings prior to the Summer Series of Institute meetings beginning in May. These will be held at over 700 points throughout rural Ontario and will be attended by the keenest and most progressive home-makers, teachers, and community builders throughout the province. Not all of these will be for women either, for special requests have come from some centres asking for evening meetings, so that men might be there too. The gatherings will be very varied as to place, attendance, and character. Many, and those among the most interesting and profitable, will be held in the new, sparsely settled pioneer districts where the Branch has difficulty in securing the ten girls and women necessary to organize. But how brave, bright, and resourceful these are, the very darlings of the hearts of the lecturers and demonstrators who will be privileged to visit them. Others will be in the wealthy older parts of the province, village, small town, and country. Some meetings will be in halls, churches, schools; others will be in farm homes and on green spacious, tree-shaded lawns; more will be the great community pic-nics, now such an outstanding feature of Ontario life. The attendance will range from ten to ten thousand, and the ten will receive just as eager and enthusiastic service from the Government delegates as the ten thousand.

“It is not as easy to make good as a Departmental lecturer this year as it was fifteen years ago,” went on the Superintendent. “The work of past delegates, officers, and members—and as I look around I realize sadly that some of them will be with us no more in the Branches—has resulted in such self-development among the women themselves that rural communities can now successfully carry out demonstrations, get up papers, and give addresses in a way undreamed of then. To-day every delegate must be an expert in her particular line, must be able to give ideas and leadership, must have a large fund of knowledge and experience behind what is put into her lectures.

The Institutes of Ontario were never in as strong a position for great and good service as in this twenty-fifth year of their existence, and the members are realizing their opportunities, responsibilities, and privileges in receiving help for themselves and giving it to others.”

A remarkable little group they were, twenty-five or so, to whom these words were addressed—teachers of Domestic Science, First Aid and Nursing, Sewing and Millinery, Interior Decoration and Labor Saving, doctors, women of literary ability, a magistrate, successful mothers, expert housekeepers, women of unusual organizing and executive ability, good speakers and good mixers, who with all their high ideals still kept their feet firmly on the ground of practical every day needs in the home and in the neighborhood. Needless to say, it was a sunshiny group, full of the spirit of service and unselfish co-operation, and it came from all parts of Ontario.

A very busy two days were spent in conferring with the Departmental heads as to present needs, the best methods of meeting them, services available to the home-makers through the various Government Departments, the Colleges, the Motion Picture Bureau, Extension work and how to improve it, how in brief, to make the whole service more helpful.

So has the little mustard seed thought of a quarter of a century ago planted among the rural home-makers grown into this splendid tree of co-operation between the home, the college, and the Government, which in the year of its Silver Anni-

Non-partisan, non-sectarian, co-operative in method, scientific in teaching, the Institutes draw into their friendly circle in increasing numbers those aiming to make first their own homes better, happier, more efficient; secondly, the whole community. The men and women so concerned will pause a moment this summer to rejoice and take stock at many Silver Anniversary celebrations before proceeding in their sane, calm way towards the Golden in great and scientific nation-building.

THE NEW HAND BOOK.

Welcome as Spring itself comes the new Women's Institute Hand Book to officers and members who study it as a text book on methods of work. To the uninitiated the plain little brown book with the "Home and Country" badge on the outside and the Government coat-of-arms on the inside which will be dug out of many an officer's bag and over which so many eyes will eagerly and intently pore this summer, may be something of a puzzle in the interest it arouses. But when it is remembered that it is the first Hand Book issued since before the war, and is filled with suggestions from cover to cover on such topics as How to Conduct Meetings, Parliamentary Procedure, How to Organize a New Branch, Duties of Officers, Presidents, Secretaries, Directors, District Work, Programme Planning, Services Available from the Departments of State, Girls' Institutes, a brief History of the Ontario Institutes themselves and what they have aimed at and accomplished, its mysterious attractiveness is explained.

A copy is being sent out by the Institutes Branch of the Department of Agriculture at once to each Branch and District President and Secretary, and every paid-up member of an Ontario Institute may also have one free by writing for it and enclosing her full address to the Superintendent, Institutes Branch, Department of Agriculture, Toronto.

BETTER AND MORE SCIENTIFIC AGRICULTURE.

Mrs. R. G. Leggett.

One of the most important of the Standing Committees is that on Agriculture. The following points from the report of Mrs. R. G. Leggett, convener for Ontario, will be suggestive and helpful to members when planning lines of work for the home and the Institute during the coming year.

"The first industry in the world was Agriculture and it remains the main one to-day. Encourage better and more scientific methods wherever and whenever possible in your locality.

(1) Income Producing Features:

Encourage the side lines in farming—Bee-keeping, poultry raising, small fruit growing—by interesting more people in them, sharing plants, seeds and bulbs.

Give the children interested a setting of eggs from your prize fowls, and encourage them to compete at the fairs.

Find a good market for busy mothers where they can dispose of fresh eggs and broilers for cash.

Encourage the use of vacant lots by poor people for gardening purposes.

(2) Educational:

Encourage the establishment of school gardens, or school-directed home gardens by co-operation in making, care, and the provision of a supply of seeds.

Help with the School Fair.

Give prizes at the Fall Fairs for Juveniles.

Aid in establishing Playgrounds and Community Parks.

See that there is a pure water supply for the school.

(3) Beautification:

See that roadsides are kept free of weeds and rubbish.

Encourage the improvement of lawns, the planting of trees, shrubs, and flowers, and the making of window boxes.

Divide with your neighbors beautiful shrubs, perennials, surplus seeds and seedlings.

Give the children a plot of ground of their own, and a few seeds of easily grown flowers.

Take time to teach them to protect the trees, and to see the beauty of growing plants, the budding trees, the birds' nests and the sunsets.

Have community bees for the cleaning of cemeteries, school grounds, and waste places.

Encourage in villages the disposal of disfiguring fences between lots, and the marking of divisions by strips of flowers.

Arrange for illustrated lectures in the community in Horticulture and Agriculture.

Consult available publications on Agriculture especially Dairying, Fruit and Vegetable growing, Bee-keeping, Poultry-Raising.

Co-operative Marketing—Devote some time to these features which will interest a majority of your members."

RURAL SCHOOL FAIRS

My plea—Give the boys and girls a chance! Boys and Girls are more valuable than all the farms and live stock in the Province of Ontario. The majority of the boys and girls born on our farms can be developed into good citizens, if given a fair chance during childhood to use their energies wisely directed in doing useful things. Nothing is too good for the boy of to-day—the farmer of to-morrow.

OBJECTS OF SCHOOL FAIRS.

1. To prepare the boy and girl for the farm.

2. To give boys and girls something definite to do and to encourage a friendly rivalry amongst them.

3. To afford an opportunity for boys and girls to use their energy and enthusiasm in a productive and useful way.

All School Fair Work is organized and conducted by the Agricultural Representative. The Department of Agriculture supplies and distributes all seed for the Home Plots. Pupils in Old Ontario pay the cost price of eggs but the Department pays the cost of distribution.

The Department issues prize lists, furnishes tent, poultry coops and other equipment for the School Fair and supplies judges. The local people supply all the prize money, varying from $60.00 to $150.00 per fair. Trustee boards, township councils, county councils and public spirited persons each contribute their share.

The classes of exhibits at the Fairs may be summarized as follows:

1. Products from home plots from seed distributed.

2. Poultry and live stock.

3. Collections of natural objects, such as mounted weeds and flowers, weed seeds, insects and the work of plant diseases and insects.

4. Collections of fruit.

5. Manual training and household science work, such as cooking and sewing.

6. Educational work including essays, maps, drawing, writing, art.

7. Miscellaneous Contests of various kinds.

HOW WOMEN'S INSTITUTES CAN RENDER ASSISTANCE IN SCHOOL FAIR WORK.

1. Suggest classes for Domestic Science and sewing, to be incorporated in the prize lists.

2. Encourage girls to enter such classes at the Fair. Conduct sewing classes and give cooking lessons for girls.

3. Arrange luncheon in picnic style and supply hot coffee on School Fair Day.

4. Conduct booths at the School Fair.

5. Give special prizes for girls' work.

6. Assist in the judging of girls' classes at the School Fair.

Nagging Our Way to Divorce

BY A. C. FATHER

HAVE you a little.....? No, reader you're wrong. I was not going to ask the question the manufacturers of a well known soap company ask in their advertising. My question is "have you a little....or big nagger in your home?" I fancy most Canadian homes possess a nagger. Grant me that and I'll ask another question. "Who is the champion nagger in your home?" If it is a woman reading this, she'll reply "my husband." Most men will untruthfully answer "my wife." If hundreds of Canadian husbands told the truth, the whole truth, they'd find themselves occupying the centre of the spotlight. Granted there are many wives who nag and find fault, the question may be asked "Who made them naggers?" Now, husbands, answer it truthfully.

Where is the woman who can stand up under three-hundred-and-sixty-five days of abuse and nagging, year in and year out, without the inevitable occurring—the ultimate degenerating of herself into the ranks of fault finders?

Small pity have I for the man who assumes an injured air, as he proceeds to unfold his unhappy home life with friend wife. The wife of course is entirely to blame. He calls her a nagger—his life is ruined. If he marries again, he won't marry a nagger—one experience is enough and much more of the same twaddle. I'd like nothing better than to slip into that man's home quietly and unknown to either husband or wife, hide and, watch how that husband behaves himself, how he talks at meal time. I see him now starting out with a song and dance about the weak tea. The wife takes little heed until he becomes personal in his remarks and she driven to desperation retaliates with a word barrage that shakes the table. The husband postpones the argument 'til the next meal. He pulls a long face and blames the woman for the rift in the lute of domesticity.

I once was a nagger. When I commenced to write this article I said I'd tell the truth and I confess freely that had my wife not been possessed of the patience of a thousand Jobs, I suppose I'd have gone on nagging my way to the lawyer's office. I suppose even then I'd have found fault with the way the legal gentleman proposed to draw up the separation papers. My wife faced the situation bravely. She took all my abuse like a soldier takes discipline. She seldom retaliated, seldom talked back. When I scolded she cooed and when I found fault she smiled. At times when I imagined

KNITTED CLOTHES FOR SUMMER-TIME

By Charlotte M. Storey

WHEN the Rev. Wm. Lee, an Englishman away back in the sixteenth century invented the knitting machine, he didn't know what he had started; he didn't know that he had invented something that was going to play a stellar role in the summer fashions of 1922, but nevertheless that is just what he did. Not to have one or more knitted garments—the more the better—in the summer wardrobe is to be outside the realm of fashion—hopelessly outside of it.

To be fashionable this summer one must have several sweaters, at least a couple of knitted skirts, a dress and perhaps a suit and most certainly a cape, which by the way is just about as much a scarf as it is a cape, two or three smaller scarfs, a couple of hats and one or two handbags. These indispensable articles may be the product of a descendant of the knitting machine invented by the aforesaid Reverend gentleman, hand-knitted or crocheted and it doesn't really matter so much whether they are of wool, mohair, fibre silk or silk and wool; the main thing is that they must be knitted or crocheted. Of course there are woven fabrics for sports apparel but it is of the knitted things we wish to speak first. If there is any space left we shall find plenty of other sports things to write about.

To begin with the ubiquitous sweater—the newest of its kind slips on over the head but the Tuxedo is still extant. The length is a matter of choice. A few inches one way or the other makes no difference and whether they hang straight and rather close fitting, or blouse over an elastic band is also a matter of choice. And the sleeves may be long or short. The collar, however, depends very much upon the style of the sweater of which, more later.

Concerning collars, sweaters that are made like box coats and fasten with a tie or a single button at the throat have Peter Pan collars. Slip-overs have Bramley collars of some sort of fabric like ratine, linen or organdie and an odd one here and there has a kid collar. Fabric collars are worn on sweaters just as much as they are on dresses and as they are detachable and can be kept fresh looking they are really much prettier than a knitted collar.

THE color scheme of the sweaters this year is marvellous, with jade, any of the yellows, various reds and Delf blue, black and white the most popular colors, but it isn't so much the solid color in the sweater that counts as it is the colors that are knitted in to form the pattern; although the stitch is plain as a rule, the patterns are very elaborate. For instance, there is a many-colored Norwegian design and another copied from the Mexican blanket. These on a white or a beige background are very effective.

It would be impossible to describe in detail the many bright ideas incorporated in these garments, especially those that are hand-made, but one that we noticed particularly was turned out in two colors, a green background, say, and the design in white. Through the body part in the region of the waist the design was conventional and around the bottom there was a floral border about four inches deep. Mahogany fibre silk was used for two different sweaters in a collection which he had the privilege of looking over, one being in slip-over style and the other Tuxedo and in both the ornamentation was a border of white French angora wool which was extremely effective.

Something else that is new this season and will appeal to many of our readers is the use of small wooden beads strung on the wool and knitted in with it to carry out a design. A Magician of the crochet hook showed us a slip-on Russian blouse

Knitted wool hat and sweater for the Summer Girl. These photographs are by courtesy of the "Jeane Duncan Yarn Shoppe," Toronto.

Fibre silk slipover sweater (mahogany), with French Angora border of beaver-colored wool in which thirty-five hundred green wooden beads were used. Incidentally the blouse had an elastic run through it at the waist concealed by the blousing of the body. The beads were used in the revers and cuffs.

There is a new wool called "kurly" which works up somewhat like baby lamb and can be brushed up with a comb which is made for that particular purpose if one likes. A sweater that we saw made of this wool had a plain yoke knitted of a silk and wool mixture and the body of the curl.

Skirts come next in order as they are really the complement of the sweater and do duty for either a dress or a suit, which, perhaps explains why sweaters and skirts in some places at least, are more popular than dresses and suits, although the stores are showing a great many of both of the latter. The skirts are usually knit in one color with a ribbed stitch. We have seen several coats and dresses knitted in the same way.

Last year's cape is shown again this year at a very popular price and it has a very interesting rival in the long wide scarf which is knitted six inches or so, deeper in the centre and has fringed ends and a collar. For this garment a fancy block stitch is used.

And speaking of scarfs they are having a tremendous vogue just now. Of course there is the long wide brushed or plain woollen scarf with striped border and fringe which takes the place of a wrap on a cool summer evening and there is the wide homespun scarf, and above all there is the fibre silk which comes in all sizes in the brightest of colors, solid as well as combination stripes, also the drop-stitch lacey-looking fabric. These have been very popular all Spring and will be found handy with the summer costume as well.

Having got away from cut and dried fashions in millinery we have arrived at the stage where a knitted or a crocheted hat is no longer an experiment. It is as firmly fixed in the firmament of Fashion as the sweater itself. It may be the color of the body of the sweater and trimmed with crocheted flowers made of wool the same color as the design in the sweater, or if one prefers, it may be any of the bright colors used in the design. The rolling brim and the rather large crown are considered the most generally becoming.

One of the latest additions to the knitted wardrobe is the knitted or crocheted bag lined with unbleached cotton and rope handles covered with crochet work. These bags are flat like the homespun bags so much in use now, with the same kind of a pattern embroidered on them. They are also knitted in pouch shape like the half of a coconut with crocheted covers over the rope handles. Some have crocheted flower trimming and others little woollen balls grouped together like bunches of fruit.

Knitted stockings must be taken as a matter of course and those made of fine woollen yarn in ribbed stitch are what the sports woman elects to wear the coming summer, and if they prove to be too warm why of course the wearer has the option of rolling them down at the top. Some few very advanced ladies are ordering their sports hose knitted like a man's with fancy tops.

THERE is yet another garment of supreme importance in the summer wardrobe especially if the coming summer happens to be as warm as last year. That is the bathing-suit. Knitted bathing suits have been tried and found wanting. When water-soaked they are said to be too heavy and not as practicable as those made of jersey cloth. The tunic and knicker in one piece are popular at most summer resorts and we hear that this year the tunic is being stamped and glorified with bright-colored embroideries. There is a new style of bathing suit which beginners will find extremely helpful in learning to swim. It is so new that we do not think it has yet been placed on sale in the stores but doubtless will be by the time summer holidays begin.

"The School of Peace" --- A Garden

BACON once said that "God's first act was to plant a garden, indeed the pleasantest of all occupations," as though at the very start God had set about doing the most delightful thing that could be done for the world, getting the world started, as it were, along pleasant pathways. And it has come to seem quite true that when people stray too far from their gardens, forget Nature too completely, civilization suffers.

Of course, gardens have not always been merely a lovely expression of nature. They have rather reflected the culture of civilization from the beginning of time as definitely as have art and humanity. There have been showy gardens, built to impress the visitor, whether he were emperor or friend; intimate gardens for children and lovers; formal gardens for royal display, and old-fashioned gardens of roses and herbs for mothers and weary old people. Indeed, the history of gardens, as it has been written in French, English and Italian, is a fascinating history of life itself, of progress and decline, of love and sorrow.

In even the most authentic histories it is difficult to find out just when the formal feeling toward gardening began. Homer writes of the gardens in the Isle of Cyprus which he called "gardens of eternal spring time." And there must have been rare and lovely gardens in Virgil's days, for he wrote of the places in which "the wise walked in woods of laurel and myrtle."

of all was the Pliny garden, a chart of which can still be seen in the most complete of the old French garden books. And in this elaborate wooded space were not only trees and flowers and immense stretches of lawn, but the whole gorgeous Roman equipment of living—bedrooms, dining rooms, warm and cold baths, sun-rooms, rest rooms, rose gardens and large spaces especially planted and devoted to outdoor sculpture. At this time when gardens were so essential to the life of the rich and happy, Roman explorers and conquerors returning victorious from other lands, instead of bringing exclusively gold and slaves, or fish and cherries as Lucullus did, arrived in Italy laden with roses, narcissus, bluet and amaranth roots. In such grounds as those, of which the famous Garden of Adrian is a notable example, there were trellises and arbors; the furniture was marble, the floors mosaic; ivory was used, and through the woods "roamed" little animals of carved wood. The guests of Adrian's garden parties were cheered with sounds of music from hydraulic organs, and rare, brilliant plumaged birds flew through the trees. The plants along the pathways were in vases of carved marble, alabaster and porphyry.

THE formal garden came into existence in Italy through Cardinal d'Este's use of the old Garden of Adrian as the foundation of his own beautiful estate.

"A garden is a lovable thing."

A wonderful picture of serene existence! Who could not be a philosopher walking gently with laurel at hand, ready for the brow?

Both the Chinese and the Hindus called their cultivated spaces "Gardens of the Good Dead," which sounds a little as though they were really describing pleasantly cultivated cemeteries; and perhaps they were. And Mahomet, when he spoke of a garden, always called it the "Garden of Happiness." Of course, this may have been merely his ideal of future existence, or a mental plane which he hoped to attain—because the fair things of life to the garden lover would always seem a garden of happiness.

We are sure that the old kings of Egypt cultivated their gardens, in a spirit of great magnificence. The entrance to the home of the Pharaohs was flanked by pylons with sculptured walls, and the path that led direct to the palace was bordered by solemn sphynxes. Scattered through the grounds were the kiosks and temples and palaces of the favorites. Flowers do not seem to have figured so largely in these gardens as do the royal trees. The scheme was architectural rather than floral. It was quite different in the old gardens of Pompeii, where the ruins of the house of Panza show evidence of lovely gardens with jars of flowers, cultivated paths, shrubs and the remains of rock gardens.

The Roman gardens flourished in their perfection about the time of the birth of Christ, and they seem to have been mainly great public places for the rich young men, cultivated to surround summer imperial estates. One of the most famous

And because he wished to incorporate in his scheme of beauty the old marble furniture, the rare jars and seats, his whole garden was built and furnished in an architectural manner, setting a fashion for this style of gardening which still obtains in Italy and has been imitated all over the world. It was in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, that formal gardens were most extravagant, among the loveliest being those on the estates of Lorenzo de Medici, Borghese and Colonna. The beauty of these gardens mainly depended on the interesting contrast of marble, well handled, in statues, pergolas, balustrades and vases, with the rich foliage of trees and vines. Flowers appear incidental in the scheme of the formal garden of those days.

When the garden fever reached England, at once the more intimate and homelike quality crept into the cultivation of the space around the house. Flowers were the delight of master and gardener. England did not need to cultivate her trees, for she had had them almost from the beginning, and her damp climate took care of her great stretches of green. But her love of gardening grew until it became a favorite pastime of the leisure class and the joy of the busy people. In a quaint and delightful old book by John James, published in seventeen twelve, and subscribed for by all the nobility of England, we are told that "gardening is always better for being under the eye of a master who has some skill in it himself." And thus we see that the real garden is the intimate joy of each man, and not a thing that can be given to him or done for him. And we feel that Bacon was right in calling it the pleasantest of all occupations.

I was real angry and commenced to wag my tongue more venomously than usual she would go off into another room, returning only when I had cooled off. For nearly two years following my marriage, I stood by my guns. My day was spoiled if I found nothing to nag about. The habit was acquired without trouble but it was difficult to break. Habit? Yes, that is all nagging is. Some no doubt, will call it a disease. In the end it was the patience of my wife that cured me. The day the climax came I was wrought up over something of small consequence but it offered the opportunity to nag and seizing it, I nagged. Brazenly my wife smiled into my face. "Please don't nag so, I'm doing the best I can" was all she said. That was at luncheon. Later on in the afternoon on my way up town I went home.

My wife did not hear me on the steps. I found her in her bed-room huddled in the rocking-chair. She was crying. I had an idea I was the cause of the tears. Bravery never shone more brightly. She wanted to be brave; to stand up under all my nagging but I saw the king link in the chain of nerves had snapped. "I can't stand your fault finding any longer. won't you please, dear, stop it?" she pleaded.

I began to reason. "Why," I asked myself, "do you go on from day to day, nagging, nagging?" Then the voice of conscience whispered "If your unbridled tongue is going to break your wife's health—better bridle it" the voice said.

I promised I'd conquer the habit. I did. It was hard work. Seldom does my tongue run away now. I think twice before I let my lips form a sentence of nagging words and like the angry man, who cools off, I postpone mailing the letter until to-morrow.

What did I nag about? Everything. I seemed to take the greatest delight in loosening my poisoned darts. My tongue wagged over trivial things; continually making mountains out of mole hills. When things went skywards at the office, I took it out on the wife when I reached home. I found fault when the soup was hot and kicked when it was cold. One day there'd be too much salt in the porridge, another not enough. I picked flaws in the pancakes. Raised the roof because there was fish for luncheon one day and threw fits another day because fish was off the menu. I cried to high Heaven when a slightly soiled cloth was spread on the table (I have eaten in restaurants, off a dirty cloth and never blinked an eye).

On a night when I wanted to go to a show, my wife tired after a hard day's work would naturally object. I'd storm and fume and tell her she was selfish. I kicked over this and that, until my spare moments were all spent in kicking. Men and mules are alike when they kick. Neither requires brains to do it.

There are thousands of men naggers. There is the business man who when a deal falls flat, vents his spleen on his stenographer or clerk. He finds fault for the pleasure of finding it. His appetite for grouching must be satisfied, let the axe fall where it may. Again there is the husband who finds fault continually with his wife because she does not look like a movie vamp about the kitchen job of scrubbing pots and pans. A woman can be neat and tidy about the house but no sane man, should expect a wife, burdened with household duties to be a fashion plate in the kitchen.

I know men, who if they find a spot of dirt on the floor a soiled towel in the bathroom, a pinch of salt spilled over the range, or a hair in the butter, go into hysterics and demand of their wife "why don't you house-clean?" They are the men who when housecleaning is underway, nag, nag, nag from morning until night, about the house being upside down.

You know the man who is always right. Never wrong. The "I told you so" kind of a man. Did you ever see a bigger fault finder in your life? He's happiest when he is pestering some one else. It seems to me the man who is always right is always a nuisance.

NOW then men, we'll have an inning. We'll place on the pedestal for exhibition "the nagging woman." We'll take the woman who went to the altar with a frown. There are plenty of these women married to meek husbands, who take everything as a matter of course. It is these women who have paved the way to domestic happiness with obstacles that men find hard to hurdle.

Take for instance the wife who finds fault with the numerous articles a husband brings home. It is one of the privileges of a husband to act as a Santa Claus throughout the year. He delights in arranging surprise gifts for his wife. Said surprise may take the form of a pair of boudoir slippers, a ring, or any one of several things. When she takes the gift the wife finds the slippers are of a nasty color, the ring is only faked gold or the silver candelabra isn't silver. Nothing takes the sweet out of sweet heart quicker than a wife who incessantly finds fault with her husband's remembrances.

Then again there is the wife who harps and harps about her physical ailments. All her husband receives at meal time is a frown and the wife proceeds to dwell long and loud upon a pain in the back or a twitching over her right eye. This line runs the full course of the meal. Husbands are not brutes. Most men with sick wives spend fortunes to see them regain good health. But to-day's modern conditions produce a few lazy wives, who excuse their laziness in imaginary pains and ills. If it is a home where day following day, nothing more delectable than canned tomatoes, canned sardines and canned this and that is served at meals, it may be taken for granted that laziness has conquered and holds the fort. Men working under present day business demands require something better than canned food to stimulate them on to success. Modern husbands have learned to shy at can openers.

Again we have the wife, one who is better educated than her husband. She invariably finds fault with his manner of speech, his grammar and worries to death over his dress. She is the wife who bawls him out before company. It has not been the good fortune of every husband, many of them successful, to have taken a post-graduate course in a finishing school and a wife who ridicules him before others, shows very little of her boasted and vaunted finesse. Women have a clever way of saying mean things that men can never hope to equal.

A wife should not attempt to make a kitchen drudge out of her husband. The wife who finds fault with her husband because he does not turn in and wash the dishes or help put the children to bed, is piling up no end of trouble for herself. If a husband, after completing his day's work, wants to set his hand doing the work of a kitchen maid that is his privilege. Many do it, but no woman need expect a man to do it. No man giving his best energy to his work, can possibly come home at night and act a kitchen maid without his business ability or his health suffering. It is the wife's duty to fuel the home fires and manage the house. The husband finds all he can do in getting a secure footing on the ladder to success. There are husbands staring up the stairs of success, where if help and encouragement were forthcoming from their wives, they would be stepping up the stairs.

Husbands and wives don't nag. Determination and will power, will curb a hasty tongue. Married people should be tolerant, should make allowances for the shortcomings of either. We need to become tongue-tied when we feel like nagging, or we will develop into a nation of grouches.

To add a bright note of contrast, the collar and cuffs are made of checked silk gingham. The neck is cut deep enough to permit the blouse to be slipped on over the head. To wear with it, is a neat skirt of poplin. The latter is a very good-looking two-piece model, gathered across the back and at each side at the waist-line. A slash pocket appears at each side of the front and is bound with self-material and finished with a pearl button. A narrow belt of the poplin completes the skirt.

The blouse is made unusually attractive by using beading design 12601 and carrying it out with steel beads. An oval shaped motif is placed at each side of the front from which double lines of beads run to the shoulders. The material chosen for the blouse is Georgette which falls in soft folds when it is gathered into the piping at the neck. The sleeves are in two sections giving the new slashed effect. The skirt of tweed has two gores, giving the appearance of the new wrap-around models. It is gathered across the back and the side-front closing is finished with a deep hem.

Priscilla Dyes at Home

In Priscilla's garden I saw the funniest "washing" hung out to dry.

"What on earth is it," I enquired—"a gypsy doll's wardrobe?"

"My goodness, No!" replied practical Priscilla, "merely some dyeing tests."

And this is Priscilla's story.

"You see, when I realized that I had to give up my position and stay at home with Mother I naturally fretted owing to my dual loss of occupation and income. I conceived the idea of dyeing certain of the cheaper fabrics in very desirable colors and submitting the results to those of my friends who are interested in the home artistic. I studied assiduously and was able to suggest schemes and themes of color for home decoration. Quite naturally they desired their homes brightened and beautified but thought the cost of such improvement to be prohibitive. I did not make much headway until the DeVinne-Smythes gave me my first commission to decorate several bedrooms.

"Mrs. DeVinne-Smythe, for all her riches, was most considerate. 'My dear,' she said when she received my bill, 'You have surely made a mistake. Your charge is absurdly low.' I insisted that I had made a handsome profit. 'Very well,' she said, 'I shall not only recommend you to my friends, but I shall not hesitate to tell them of the wonderful artistic effect you have achieved and the economy of your work.'

And thus the Social Lioness helped the "Mouse!"

"But those funny little colored scraps fluttering like flag signals in the breeze!" I persisted.

"They are just as I said," she replied, "dyeing tests—or samples—have it whichever way you like!"

Pulling in her clothes line, Priscilla unpegged the "samples" and proceeded to explain.

"This is a piece of cotton corduroy costing a-dollar-and-a-quarter a yard. It is dyed an 'individual shade' of grey obtained by adding a small amount of purple to grey the dye. It is intended to be used for portieres in Mrs. Judson Coombes' summer home. These other three pieces are also cotton corduroy each slightly darker than the other, but scarcely a full shade of color-difference between them all. Mrs. Coombes wished for the first color, but I know she will select one of the deeper tones. Then these scraps are cotton voiles, muslins and even humble cheesecloth, dyed in colors that one sees only in the most expensive fabrics. The pieces of wool serge are dyed to prove that a real navy blue and a real midnight blue may be imparted to this cloth which was an unattractive tan. These pieces of crepe are dyed to match an expensive gown. I shall have a silk stocking, ribbon and parasol order from these samples. I call this 'apparel harmony.' The black pieces are for a mourning order—the Latimers, you know. It's so sad,—financial reverse and death of the bread winner. I just stepped right in and told Mrs. Latimer I could save her a lot of money and as the expense at times of bereavement is heavy, even without financial embarrassment, she eagerly accepted my offer of help. I shall take these samples right over to Mrs. Latimer and she shall have mourning clothes for the whole family by this evening."

"Impossible!" I cried in astonishment.

"Nothing seems impossible with my home dyeing plant," retorted Priscilla emphatically. "I could dye the curtains for a Broadway Musical Comedy production, I could 'color-scheme' the palatial residences of the Goulderbilts for a mere song and I could save money and give great service to the poorest family in Colorville."

"Colorville"—I gasped, "where is that?"

"Right here," laughed Priscilla. "Of course its right name is Meadsville, but people call it Colorville now! There's a reason!"

"Let's talk about my apartment," I suggested.

"Another order" sighed Priscilla as we turned to enter the house. "Do you know that every woman could do what I am doing?" she rattled on. "It's just a joy to create things this way, and it's so easy."

But my mind was already touring round the rooms of my dreary flat—I had visions!

and poured cream over the whole thing. It overflowed into the saucer.

"Was it good?" That was what it was! Good—You cannot beat it for a Hot-Weather-Second-Course-For-Lunch. It was no work, either. She had too much sense to work when it was 100° in the shade.

"What do I eat for Breakfast?" No porridge. I can do without porridge for a few weeks. Fruit, dairy products, and an egg, or one rasher of bacon—and eat slowly.

"Toast?" Certainly.

"For your dinner?"

Well, either meat or fish once a day and vegetables and fruit. Eat slowly and go slow generally.

Take the shady side of the street every time. Drink a great deal of water—at least six glasses a day.

BATHS—CLOTHES—FANS.

Wear few, light, white clothes. Take three baths a day, sponge or shower preferred. Carry an umbrella, or put a fresh green cabbage leaf in the crown of your hat. Keep cool, or if you cannot keep cool, keep as cool as you can! Put his straw bonnet on the horse.

See if you cannot buy your wife one of these good old Palm Leaf Fans and use it yourself any time she can spare it.

Camera Notes for the Novice

By J. L. Williams

WHILE the real photographic enthusiasts know no "close season" for their hobby, to most camera owners, the summer's sunshine is as closely related to their Kodaks as ice is to their skates. This being true, thousands of amateur photographers will now be busy getting their little black boxes out and polishing them up in preparation for the outings and excursions of another summer.

But how much more pleasure would be got out of the camera if one could only be reasonably certain that all the exposures made would turn out good. Yet there is no reason why they should not. Every camera sold by a reputable dealer will take perfectly good and clear pictures if properly handled. Space precludes me going into details as to the various styles and makes of cameras, but assuming you have an instrument of the box type, the observation of the following few and simple rules should result in your pictures being practically one hundred per cent. good:—

1. Be sure you put the film in the camera properly. Do not allow it to unroll or become loose, as this permits light to get in at the ends and thus your films are fogged at the outset.

2. Do not take pictures against the sun. This can only be done with success by an expert or an advanced amateur.

3. Do not take pictures less than six feet from the subject.

4. Hold the camera firmly and work shutter by a gentle pressure so as not to jar or shake the camera. Shaking the camera produces vibration in the shutter which results in a blurred picture.

5. Remember, a few minutes before the sun goes down is not a good time for taking snaps with a box camera, unless it is the sunset itself you are taking. Better far to save your film until the next day. Generally speaking, the nearer mid-day the greater the chance of success will be with the novice.

6. Almost every camera of the box type has three stops or apertures which govern the ratio of light passing through the shutter. I strongly advocate always using the largest aperture for snaps. Never mind if occasionally this will slightly over-expose your films. The manager of one of the largest developing and printing businesses in America says that ninety per cent of the average amateur's failures are caused through under-exposing. If your films are a little over-exposed, the image of the subject is recorded, plus something extra which can be rectified in development. If, however, they are under-exposed, the image is not sufficiently impressed on the film and no amount of manipulation in development can put it there—intensifiers notwithstanding.

7. Just exercise the same ordinary precautions with the finishing of your film that you do with other things. You do not take your watch to the little blacksmith to be repaired, nor leave your week's laundry with the painter and decorator. Therefore have your films developed at a reliable place where this work is their business, not a sideline.

Next month I will deal with Cameras of the folding type and will show by illustrations how some extraordinary pictures may be obtained in a very ordinary way.

Now That the Strawberries Are Here

BY FRANCES M. McNALLY

THOSE of us, who have gathered wild strawberries in their native haunts, and tasted their delicious sweetness, and delicacy of flavour agree with Sir Isaak Walton when he said "Doubtless God could have made a better berry but doubtless God never did." No other berries are more readily digested or have greater health value than the wild strawberries. They seem to be "congealed sunshine with all the therapeutic value of the sun concentrated in them." It seems a pity that the wild variety has become so rare and so seldom found on the market. Perhaps, though, if they were to be had at every corner grocery store, most of their health value would have departed. Certainly they are at their best when fresh picked and served at once. This is quite as true of the cultivated strawberry. Those which come to us early from the South are decidedly lacking in the characteristic flavour and fine appearance of the native berries fresh from the vines.

cup marshmallows, cut in pieces, one-half cup heavy cream, two tablespoons sugar. Whip the cream, gradually beat in the sugar, then fold in the marshmallows and nearly all the strawberries. Turn into glass cups. Use remaining berries to garnish top.

Strawberry Sponge. One-and-one-third tablespoons granulated gelatine, one-third cup cold water, one-third cup boiling water, one cup sugar, one tablespoon lemon juice, one cup strawberry juice, whites three eggs, whip from cups cream. Soak the gelatine in cold water, dissolve in boiling water, strain, add sugar, lemon and strawberry juice. Chill in a pan of ice water. When quite thick beat until frothy, then add the whites of the eggs beaten stiff and fold in the cream. Line a mould with large strawberries cut in halves, turn in the mixture, smooth evenly and chill.

Strawberry Bavarian Cream. Mash sufficient strawberries to make one pint. Cover two tablespoons granulated gelatine with

The best of berries

Although the strawberry is usually a very wholesome food, there are a few people who have a striking idiosyncrasy against it. They find it irritating to the throat and the cause of digestive disturbances. Some persons find that eating the berry with pepper or lemon juice enables them to digest it better.

There are many ways of serving this delicious fruit. For breakfast or the first course at luncheon, they are daintier served with the hulls on, around a little mound of powdered sugar. To eat, dip them in the powdered sugar, holding the berries by the hull or stem.

Strawberry Cocktails. Into each glass slice five or six large strawberries, squeeze over them the juice of one lemon and one orange. Place in ice-box to chill. At serving time add a heaping teaspoon of powdered sugar and a tablespoon of finely chopped ice.

Strawberry Marshmallow Dessert. One cup strawberries cut in halves, one-half one-half cup of cold water and soak for one-half hour. Add one-half cup powdered sugar to the strawberry juice and stir until the sugar is dissolved. Stand the gelatine over hot water until dissolved and add it to the strawberry juice. Stand the bowl in a pan of ice or ice-water. When mixture begins to thicken beat until frothy. Fold in the whip from one pint of cream. Turn into a mould and chill.

Strawberry Short Cake 1. One quart strawberries, one pint flour, four teaspoons baking powder, one-half teaspoon salt, two teaspoons sugar, three-quarters cup milk, one-quarter cup butter. Mix dry ingredients, sift twice. Rub in the butter with the tips of fingers. Add the milk gradually until a soft dough is formed. Toss on a lightly floured board. Divide into two parts. Pat or roll each part to one-half inch in thickness. Place one on a buttered round layer cake tin. Brush the

Table talks

By Mrs. Knox

June's Alaska Surprise

(Something entirely new)

IN writing these "talks" I have tried not to use superfluous adjectives, but for this month's new dessert it seems there is nothing that will quite describe it except to tell you that it is the best and most unusual dessert of the season.

You will find it easy to make and the favorable comments that will be made when it is served (either when you are entertaining or as a treat for the family), will please you. Its appearance is unique and its flavor delicious. Here is the recipe:

ALASKA SURPRISE CHOCOLATE MIXTURE

1½ envelopes Knox Sparkling Gelatine.
½ cup cold water 1 teaspoonful vanilla
1 quart milk Few grains salt
3 squares unsweetened chocolate, 1 cup sugar
Soak gelatine in cold water ten minutes. Melt chocolate, add sugar. Scald milk; add the soaked gelatine and when dissolved, the chocolate mixture and salt. Then add flavoring. Turn into melon mold, or square bread pan, first dipped in cold water and chill.

CREAM FILLING

½ envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
¼ cup cold water ½ cup sugar
1 pint heavy cream 1 teaspoonful vanilla
1 cup scalded milk.
Soak gelatine in cold water ten minutes and dissolve in hot milk; then add sugar. Set bowl containing mixture in pan of cold water and stir until mixture begins to thicken. Add cream, beaten until stiff, add flavoring.

When chocolate mixture is very firm, remove enough of the center to make room for the Cream Filling, leaving walls about three-fourths inch thick. Fill with the cream mixture and replace chocolate mixture over the top. Chill. Fruit may be molded in the cream filling if desired.

NOTE—Either one of the above recipes may be used as a dessert alone. Chocolate ice cream may be used in place of chocolate mixture in which to mold the cream filling.

top with butter. Place the other half on top. Bake in a hot oven twenty minutes. Stem and mash the berries and add one cup of sugar. As soon as short cake is thoroughly baked, take it from the oven, break it apart and put strawberries between the layers. Cover the top with whipped cream and garnish with whole berries.

Strawberry Short Cake 2. Beat two eggs until thick. Add three-quarters cup fine sugar gradually, beating well then add one-third cup of water and one-third teaspoon vanilla. Mix and sift two cups of flour, one and one-half teaspoons baking powder and one-quarter teaspoon salt. Fold lightly into the first mixture. Turn into two layer cake pans and bake in a slow oven about one-half hour. Cut one pint strawberries into small pieces and cover with three-quarters cup sugar. Spread this between the layers of the sponge cake. Cover the top layer with whipped cream or with a meringue made by beating the white of one egg until stiff and adding one tablespoon of sugar gradually.

Strawberry Pie. Bake a rich crust in one pan and strips of crust in another. Fill crusts with strawberries sweetened to taste and place strips across. Cover with whipped cream or meringue.

Strawberry Ice. Four cups water, one and one-half cups sugar, two cups strawberry juice, one tablespoon lemon juice. Sprinkle the strawberries with the sugar, cover and let stand two hours. Mash, squeeze through cheese cloth, add water and lemon juice and freeze.

Strawberry Sherbet. Boil about five minutes, one quart of crushed berries, two cups sugar, one quart water, juice of two lemons. Let cool. Strain into freezer; when partly frozen carefully remove cover and add well beaten whites of two eggs. Finish freezing.

Strawberry Ice Cream. Three pints cream, two boxes berries, one and three quarters cups sugar. Wash and hull the berries, sprinkle with sugar and let stand two hours. Mash and squeeze through cheese cloth. Freeze the cream to consistency of mush, using three parts ice to one part salt. Gradually add fruit juice and finish freezing.

Strawberry Mousse. One quart cream, one box strawberries, one cup sugar, one and one-quarter tablespoons granulated gelatine, two teaspoons cold water three tablespoons hot water. Wash and hull the berries, sprinkle with sugar and let stand one hour; mash and rub through a fine sieve, add the gelatine soaked in cold water and dissolved in hot water. Set in a pan of ice or ice water and stir until it begins to thicken; then fold in the whipped cream, put in a mould, cover pack in two parts ice to one of salt and let stand four hours. Use a mould with a tight cover and seal the meeting of the cover with the mould with a strip of cloth dipped in melted butter and bound around the mould. A coffee tin or a baking powder tin may be used for a mould.

Strawberry Tartlets. Roll out puff paste very thinly and line a dozen buttered gem pans with it, and prick a few holes in the middle of each to prevent the pastry from puffing up. Bake for twenty minutes in a hot oven. In the meantime pick free from stalks enough strawberries to allow six or eight to each tartlet according to their size. They should be ripe, but quite firm and unbroken, and as even in size as practicable. Put them in a basin and sprinkle sugar over them. Make a syrup by dissolving half a pound of lump sugar in two cupfuls of water, boil this until it is reduced to one cupful. Skim it, add a few drops of red colouring to colour the syrup a deep red. Pour the syrup gently through a strainer over the strawberries and let them stand for five minutes. Arrange the strawberries on the tartlets. Whip stiffly one cupful of cream, with a tablespoon of sugar, and with a forcing bag and rose tube, squeeze out a little in the middle of each tartlet. Serve cold. Instead of strawberries, raspberries, currants, or cherries, can be used, the last named having been carefully stoned.

THE ANTISEPTIC LINIMENT

It was with a very shaky little hand that June signed the letter. "He won't come," her heart told her, "he won't come anyway."

And just to drown the steady insistence of that little thought June made that last term in the little red school-house a very stiff one for the pupils—and herself.

And then one evening early in June when the new budding balsam and pine gave out a soft elusive fragrance, Jim Beaumont tramped once more around the Pinefield Bay. His hands were shoved deep in his pockets and there was an anxious little pucker between his eyes. "I'd only proposed to a girl before, I know better how to go about it," he was thinking, "I'll have to tell her that it's because she made me see how much I could do here, that she opened my eyes to the opportunities of rural work by the way she handled those kids—and that I can't do it alone—Oh shucks! A fellow doesn't propose like that. He tells her how much he loves her. But I couldn't—" Jim sighed deeply at the magnitude of the task before him, "If I talked for weeks—months—years—I couldn't tell her how much!"

Suddenly he saw her. June herself coming down the road in a rose organdy dress with the light of the setting sun behind her.

Jim's mind went blank. Then it flashed into brilliant activity. There were two children with her who must instantly be dismissed.

"See here," he said quickly to the children. "Here's a quarter for each of you now you both run to Pinefield and buy something—anything—I don't care what!"

The children slowly retreated. "Gee, Bobby stared at his newly-acquired wealth. "Say, ain't he the great scout?"

"I think," Molly replied soberly, with true feminine sagacity, "I think he paid us to beat it!"

Jim had taken June's hand, all his carefully rehearsed speeches forgotten, "June," he said simply, "I've come back—to stay I decided when I knew they wanted me that it was my duty, that I'd be no end of a shirker to do otherwise. Then the letter came and, June, just that one dear little signature made me want to come!"

"Oh!" June said, her gray eyes smiling up at him, "Oh Jim, I'm so glad!"

It was in the ways of Siegfried and Gunther, of dragons, and wondrous treasures. Then, whilst still a boy in the smithy of the armorer, Mimer, Siegfried fashioned a sword, that in keennes had never been seen before that day. Its fame has lasted through the year until this time.

In Hunland long ago King Volsun built a feasting-hall around a live oak, so that its trunk rose like a pillar in the centre. This tree was the Bramstock. Once, on a night of feasting, a grey-cloaked Wanderer strode into the hall and, swinging a great sword, drove it hilt deep, into the Bramstock. Then the Wanderer, Odin, greatest of the gods, strode from the hall. Many strove to wrench the sword from the oak, but no one could move it until Sigmund, the king's eldest son, grasped the hilt and drew forth the blade. And the story of this sword, one of battles and mighty deeds has been told through the ages.

When Laurin, king of all the dwarfs ruled from his Rose Garden, he was armed with a magic sword that conquered all, until Dietrich came and captured not only the magic sword, but King Laurin himself.

These were the swords of heroes of legend and romance, but there hang now on cottage walls, swords, that in days not so long ago, were wielded by brave men who wrought more splendid deeds than any told in fabled story of the older time.

Alice, in all Wonderland found nothing so delicious as Post Toasties

EVERYBODY knows the wonderful story of Alice, and how she took a drink that made her grow into a teeny, weeny girl. And then how she ate the cake that had "eat me" written on it with currants, and grew into a great, big giantess, so tall she could scarcely see as far as her own feet.

In the delightful and fanciful story of "Alice in Wonderland," that was very wonderful food, you must admit. But not nearly so wonderful as Post Toasties are actually.

For these delicious, crisp, and satisfying corn flakes help little boys and girls to grow just the way they would like to grow. Not teeny, weeny, or not great big. But just right.

Post Toasties are the corn flakes you want—called by their particular name because of their particular quality. In crispness, flavor and "body," Post Toasties have a charm which you are sure to recognize as belonging to them, alone.

You can't think of a more delicious dish for breakfast or lunch than a brimming bowl of Post Toasties right from the wax-sealed package, with cream or good milk, and a sprinkle of sugar if desired. Nothing quite like that flavor, and the wonderful oven-freshness!

Post Toasties are easy to get and easy to serve, and there are many helpings from a package. All good grocers sell Post Toasties. To be sure of these perfect corn flakes, order by name and get the Yellow and Red package.

A Tillicum Romance

about the only stump that one could get footing to climb, and it is mighty lucky that you hit upon it. She's a bad tempered brute, and I'm certain that you have had a mighty, unpleasant experience."

"There was no doubt of the genuine sympathy and interest in Major Colby's voice as he edged around on the top of the stump to get a better view of Alison's face.

"If I hadn't been a frequent intruder on your property, I shouldn't have known about the notched stump, but this path is a short cut to the beach and I was going fishing and wanted to save time."

"That's where I have been, great luck too. Sorry you didn't get there. Won't you take some of these, please? Too bad you didn't have the sport of catching them."

Alison opened her mouth to refuse, when the thought suddenly struck her that here was a chance offered to keep the whole untoward incident to themselves. A secret that both would have an interest in keeping buried. She could take the fish and slip quietly into the house. Major Colby could do the same, and no outsider need have knowledge of their lively introduction. In another minute she had explained the matter to the Major.

"I'll do anything you say," he promised. "I've furnished enough gossip for Tillicum on my own account without drawing you into the whirlpool of talk."

Alison gave a little gasping laugh, as the whole episode, ridiculous and otherwise, flashed across her mind. What a sweet morsel it would be for Tillicum Guild deliberations.

The Major caught that little gasping sound, and again edged himself around on his precarious perch. This time he settled himself permanently at an angle where his neighbor's very pretty face came within his range of vision. They found plenty of topics for conversation, and by the time that it was considered safe to leave their retreat, both had entirely revised their former opinions in regard to each other.

"The cow has taken off her calf to hide it, a reversion to the habit of the original, fighting, wild mother. It will be safe to go now, Miss Gordon." He slid down from the top, reached up and lightly swung Alison to the ground. "I'll have the herdsman ride down in the morning and round them up."

THEY parted at Colby's line fence, and Alison made her swift way out to the high road. The knowledge, that their neighbor was coming on the morrow to pay a formal call upon Aunt Ross and herself kept revolving in her mind.

"Well here you are at last," cried Mrs. Ross, relief and annoyance mingled in her voice. "It's after ten, and if we hadn't daylight saving it would be pitch dark. I've been worried to a frazzle about you, and was just trying to decide whether to go looking for you myself, or to send Sing."

Alison's very earnest and humble apology was finally accepted, along with the trout, as an orthodox peace offering.

It was during the next forenoon that Aunt Ross came tripping out to Alison, busily engaged in the poultry yard.

"Leave those chickens, Alison, and come and hear where I have been. You would never guess, so I'll have to tell you. I've been at Major Colby's looking over his rose-garden."

"Major Colby's?" Alison's tone expressed a degree of surprise that entirely satisfied Mrs. Ross that she had created a sensation.

"You are going to say,—'Whatever took you there?'" laughed Aunt Ross "and now, when I come to think of it I am a bit surprised myself. I was tying up that lovely Madame Edouard Herriott rose, when Major Colby stopped at the gate and looked in. He said 'Good morning,' in a very friendly way, and at once began talking about roses and the 'Daily Mail' prize. I asked him to come in and look at the black spots on the leaves of the Juliet and if he could tell me what to do to prevent them. Then I went with him to see two new roses that he has, the Princess Mary and the Red-letter; they are both lovely and he is going to give me cuttings from them, and from others that I haven't. Really, Alison, he is very nice. You needn't smile like that. He is indeed, and when he asked if he might come and see us this afternoon, I said, 'Yes' of course."

"The hatchet is going to be buried in true western fashion," murmured Alison.

The Major arrived promptly, and was presented to Alison with due form and ceremony by Mrs. Ross. She was too busy admiring the Major's gift of choice roses to observe the twinkle in his blue eyes or the deepening of the clear pink in her niece's cheeks.

The announcement of the engagement of Major Edward Trevor Colby and Miss Alison Gordon was a joyous item for the Tillicum Guild.

Alison and her Aunt were great favorites, so we at once set to work finding good points in the aforetime "pernicketty Major," and, of course, succeeded. It is an understood thing in Tillicum that we rejoice with those who rejoice, and we add a little unscriptural trimming of our own, for we usually fight with those who fight.

Under Mrs. Oswald's direction the Tillicum Guild decorated the church for the wedding. It was a Christmas wedding, and the little wooden edifice blossomed into a bower of beauty with great branches of red-berried holly, quantities of English ivy, cedar, and chrysanthemums, and a huge wedding bell edged with mistletoe.

"The Rector says that the decorations remind him of Christmas in his old Devonshire parish," remarked Mrs. Oswald as she opened the vestibule door to admit Mrs. Ross. "Yes, we've finished. The others have gone, and I'm waiting for my husband to call for me. You may as well sit down and wait, Mrs. Ross, he'll take us both home."

"There will be a crowded church tomorrow," declared Mrs. Oswald "for all Tillicum is interested in this wedding, and in the romantic way they first met. Ever so many times I have started for the shore pasture to have a look at the rescue stump, but I'm afraid of Colby's cattle, and haven't got there yet. It must have been funny to see the two of them perched up on that stump waiting for the cow to go."

Mrs. Ross tried to smother her little, choking gasp of surprise, she was a Nova Scotian and so had no intention of giving herself away. Her active mind was busy picking up the memory threads in connection with the Major's first visit.

"Yes, very funny," she agreed "but the funniest part is, that they both think that the stump episode is their very own secret still, the poor ostriches."

"Your Sing, and the Major's Wong, both told me the very day after it happened," laughed Mrs. Oswald, "trust them to find out things, and you may be sure that all the Kwongs, and Ah-fats, and Hop-Lees, etcetera, in Tillicum knew details within twenty-four hours."

The wedding day was a weather gem. Jupiter Pluvius smiled upon the occasion and took a day off from his winter's job on Vancouver Island. The blue waters of the Inlet whispered of summer sunshine, and across the Strait of Juan de Fuca the snow-capped Mainland mountains, with one beautiful tall white peak veiled in mist, suggested bride and attendants in wedding array.

"When Cupid is out for business a stump answers quite as well as a drawing room," whispered Aunt Ross to the bride and groom as they said good-bye before motoring away on their wedding trip.

"Eh, what?" chuckled the groom.

"Who told you, Aunt?" inquired the bride.

"Neither you, nor the Major, nor was it the proverbial little bird, but all Tillicum knows. It has its own special messengers for high romance."

ful thought. A couple of oily mechanics excited my envy. They were going to stay on the earth....."Too much imagination." Wasn't that what Patchinka had said? The engine started with a horrid roar. Gauthier speeded it up, to test its working. I ceased to think, till I heard his voice through the speaking tube. "One hand light on the Joystick: feel the Rudder bar with both your feet. Now we go."

"Contact—contact off!" one of those lucky beasts on earth was shouting. The skids were snatched away. Gauthier waved his order for the men to stand clear, and "rev-ed" up the engine. We were off. The revolving propeller raised clouds of dust. The big bird ran forward. Gathering speed like an avalanche with all an avalanche's noise, she rose off the ground, while a few warm spurts of oil blew against my face.

The grassy carpet beneath, the mechanics with lifted faces, Patchinka, Petro, the hangars, all sank away as if the bottom were falling out of the box. Everything inside me seemed to sink away too, and fall endlessly. I was hollow as an egg-shell, as light, and as easy to crack. There was a sensation in my toes and the soles of my feet as if they were being tickled with feathers. My hair crinkled on my head as if it had come alive. Something rose in my throat. It was the cold potato trying to come up; but colliding with my Adam's Apple it dropped back into my chest again.

What hypocrites men must be who said they loved their first flight, and weren't at all seasick. They generally wrote things—the brutes—poetry and what not. I hated them. Even Patchinka didn't seem natural to me in her love of flying. For a minute, quivering with the quiver of the plane, beaten flat against the coaming of the seat by a terrific blast from the revolving prop, I preferred Aunt Sarah to the Lady from the Air—comfortable Aunt Sarah at pleasant Bournemouth.

Suddenly, however, a change was wrought within me. It was so important to remember what to do, that I forgot to be sick, and even forgot the earth. All my attention centred on the Joystick and Rudder-bar. Gauthier's voice, sounding cold as Torquemada's, ordered me to push the Joystick forward, and, watch results. Mechanically I obeyed. I did something also to the Rudder-bar. The earth rose up like a flapping fish and threatened to hit me on the nose. To hit Gauthier's nose, too. But I didn't care a hang about his nose, if I could have smashed it while saving mine.

Back went the Joystick (why Joy?) and the earth returned where it belonged. I realized that we were up very high and going higher. Gauthier gabbled a hint on management of the Rudder-bar. I hesitated to take that hint, remembering the effect of his last order, but feared mysterious results from disobedience. Instantly, that great awkward planet I used to live on, tilted over to an angle which made me sure I had gone mad. Things like that don't happen, you know. They can't.

And yet, they did. If the world wasn't wheeling over at one angle it was inclining to another; and whatever Gauthier told me to do made matters worse. Not only the earth but the sky had turned against me, and I didn't know what to do about it. There was no kindness anywhere, and I should never see Patchinka again.

"Great!" I yelled, so pleased with the sound of my own voice that I laughed aloud.

"You like it?" Gauthier shrilled.

"Love it," I lied.

"But it has been nothing much so far. Now we will do a real stunt."

"Good."

I would have given my winnings at Monte, Wendela's winnings and Wendela herself, not to do the stunt, which I feared would upset the balance of that cold potato, not quite disposed of yet. Not mine to reason why. Mine but to do or die. And scarcely had I time to wonder why the noise lessened when our speed increased unbelievably. Compared with that of a moment ago, there was all the difference between the rush of a comet and the jog-trot of a luggage train.

My safety belt sagged, then jerked tight. What had happened?.....

Oh, nothing much. Nothing of importance. Only the earth and sky had changed places. That was all. The earth was overhead, and the sky was underneath; a million miles of empty sky that didn't stop short of Kingdom Come.

Worse still, the potato changed places too. Where it went, I don't know; but a gulp, and it was gone. This was the signal for sky and earth to shift again. Sky above; earth beneath; and whether it was the scientific satisfaction of seeing them right again, or the loss of the potato I know not; all I know is that I was suddenly quite happy, quite serene, quite gay.

Gauthier was laughing through the speaking tube. "A little seasick? Well—we have looped the loop. Shall we now try an Immelmann turn?"

"Rather!" I roared. And to my surprise I meant it.

We tried the Immelmann turn.

CHAPTER XXV.

The Extra Half Hour.

ONE morning I started awake, as if a hand had touched my arm, and a voice had shouted in my ear: "This is the day."

"What day?" I wondered. And the answer came: "The day when the tickets begin to be sold."

The tickets, of course, were for the Lottery, and Patchinka Kapieha and I intended to buy all we could lay our hands on, or our finances run to. Reluctantly I had pledged myself to buy for Wendela also. She still called me "Boy," she still insisted that I "brought her luck," and she pined (so she said) to win the third prize, diamond tiara. What with Patchinka's business, my business and Wendela's business, this looked like being my busy day. I must be ready to buy when the first ticket sellers were ready to sell; and many of those would be hotel waiters. Cafe au lait and tickets would be simultaneous.

It was now only just sunrise (I'd got into the habit of waking at dawn—glad to wake, often, from dreams of flying accidents or fearsome new stunts invented for my benefit by Gauthier) and I could afford to wallow luxuriously under my eider-down for an extra half-hour.

This eider-down was a present from Miss Horden. Rather a peculiar present from a young woman to a young man, but characteristic of Wendela: plump, solid, done up in the best material. Her mother had sent her two of these things from Holland; and the tiresome girl had threatened to cry if I refused the gift.

"I'd like you to dream of me sometimes," she snivelled, "instead of that Miss Kapieha."

Yes, she had nosed out the truth. And since then I'd been more or less at her mercy. She had become my Old Man of the Sea; for she was always at my back if not on it.

The way the thing had happened was quite simple, horribly simple.

When I didn't appear the morning after our win at the Casino, didn't show up at the table d'hôte luncheon, or send any message, Miss Wendela turned her thoughts to Cap Martin. I had telephoned from there: I had broken a dinner engagement with her, for the sake of "friends" staying at a certain Pension Rossi. It occurred to her that Cap Martin might make a nice excursion for the afternoon. Accordingly she engaged a smart, two-horsed Monte Carlo cab, and just as she was ready to start, Mendez and his fellow members of the Syndicate sauntered out from the bar.

Mendez bowed low; the others doffed hats with a sweep; certainly Dupont used his eyes; and the ever flirtatious Wendela asked Mendez if he'd heard of a Pension Rossi at Cap Martin. He had not, and consulted his companions. No doubt Mendez had boasted to them of his acquaintance with the millionaire's daughter, and that was why the pair were bent on being introduced. Wendela, of course, attributed their eagerness to her charm, and Mendez's reluctance to jealousy. She smiled on Dupont and Moroni, (especially on Dupont, no doubt) and annexed all three men as willing slaves. It was only because she was going there to spy, that she didn't take the lot with her to Cap Martin.

On the way, (as I learned later) she elaborated her so far somewhat vague plan. Driving to the Pension Rossi, whose insignificance surprised her, she enquired for a room which (she afterwards confessed) she had no intention of taking. As it happened, she was saved making an excuse, for Miss P. Smith, chaperon and dog, had been luck-bringers to the Pension. Madame Rossi had let her last room. But this did not discourage Miss Horden. With Dutch perseverance and American audacity she questioned Madame. Might there be a room free a few weeks from now? What sort of people were the pensionaires? How soon would some of them go?

Madame, nothing loth, described her boarders one by one; and learning that two ladies had come last night, a Mees Smith and a Mees Wellington, Wendela knew she need listen no further. She had met a Miss Smith, she said: (doubtless a true statement, and not exaggerated.) What was this Miss Smith like? Madame described Patchinka glowingly, and would have gone on, but Wendela stopped her. Miss Smith sounded like her Miss Smith. Was she at home?

Madame saw no reason to hide the fact that Mees Smith had departed at an early hour with a young Monsieur, a friend of both ladies. They had taken the dog, but not Mees Wellington. The latter had explained that the two were bound for a flying school, and her company was not needed. If Mademoiselle cared to wait half an hour or so, the elder Mees might return. She had gone only for a walk in the woods, Miss Horden regretted that she could not wait half an hour; but, as both ladies were out, might she peep into their rooms, in case she wanted to engage one later?

There was no objection that Madame could see. To show a room was always an advertisement; and these were her best rooms, their occupants her star boarders.

Patchinka's quarters had been made pretty with flowers from the garden, and some of the beautiful belongings purchased, (if Wendela had known) with Horden cash, were scattered about. There were silver-backed brushes and silver-topped bottles from the smart dressing-bag I had chosen, and—there was a silver photograph frame with a portrait in it.

The frame was very small—pocket size; the portrait evidently a snapshot; but it pictured a man in the leather coat and helmet of a flyer, Wendela picked it up and peered at the face, no bigger than her own thumbnail.

It took her only a second to make sure that the photograph didn't represent her own "Boy." Still, the features were vaguely familiar. She seemed to have seen them before—perhaps in newspapers. While she ransacked her memory, a name in a tiny yet clear handwriting caught her eye. Under the glitter of glass she made it out. "Sacha Kapieha to his little sister Patchinka on her 15th birthday, 1914."

You may imagine the effect of this find on such a mentality as Wendela's.

Edmonton of Yesterday and Today

Followed the settler "trekking across the plains with his ox-carts"—and suddenly, almost miraculously, the modern Edmonton arose. The French and Scotch traders sent for their families, the great hope of the transcontinental railway became a certainty, and the epic of the iron rails began. In 1885, when the Riel rebellion showed the strength and the weakness of the half-breed, the little settlement greatly augmented its numbers by an influx of refugees. That same year the Canadian Pacific was completed, and with the dawn of the twentieth century Edmonton was a town of three thousand people. Three years after a branch line was made to connect her with the great road, she was a city, and when, in 1905, the Province of Alberta was formed, she found herself its capital. In 1921 her population numbered over sixty thousand.

TO me Edmonton has still many of the airs of the only child of a late marriage. Early maturity was her birthright. The dream had lingered long before it sprang into being. That green valley had been loved and blessed by generations of Indians alone. Their prayers may be as potent as ours! And the century-old dream of the Adventurers who defied all nature behind a flimsy wooden wall—does that count for nothing?

To-day there is the dazzling young city of wide streets, splendid houses, hospitals, schools, churches, colleges, great shops and warehouses, hotels and parks—there are old-river vistas and great new industries.

But the painted past still lingers, the primal colors are not yet quite blurred, and when one least expects it comes a vibrant tone from the past.

Still the old Hudson's Bay Fort huddles up against the new Parliament buildings—long may it stand. Still one may "trade" at the Hudson's Bay Store—huge, departmental, modern.

Of late, on a summer noon, I was busy there buying French blouses. Along the crowded aisles came many an Indian, civilized, and sometimes uncivilized—down from the north country. You feel the presence of the Great North in Edmonton. These people, with their quiet-smiling, quiet-frowning faces, connect one instantly with the stories out of the past that may be deciphered from the stained glass windows on the stair-landings, which deal with various aspects of early days.

Fading links with the past may be found, also, in the old wooden building up against the Parliament Buildings. Mrs. Arthur Murphy, the well-known writer, "Janey Canuck," who is Magistrate Emily Murphy of the Juvenile Court in and for the Province of Alberta as well as the author of "Open Trails," "Seeds of Pine" and other books which have depicted the life of the country she loves to many readers, is one of the few among Canadians who realize the importance of old landmarks. She has also gathered up interesting data regarding the Factors of the days of the Fort.

There was, for instance, the case of John Rowand, who followed James Bird, the namer and first Factor of Edmonton. Before his death in 1861 he directed that his bones be sent to his old home in Quebec for burial. The order was fulfilled—but with what uncanny ceremony! Koomen-ie-kooos, a Cree, was chosen to boil the remains and clean the flesh off the bones. This he did. But to ensure himself of a slice of his hero's bravery, cut a piece out of Rowand's heart and ate it.

Pictures of Edmonton to-day call to my mind a panorama of broad flowing river and small glimmering woods, of wide imposing streets, splendid shops and houses, ugly scattered shacks, crowds of foreigners, waste spaces and vast impending energies. But always I go back in mind to river banks and hidden loveliness.

I remember an English bungalow with a wonderful view of leafy ravine, tea on a wide verandah, a Japanese servant, Spode cups.

Other pictures. That vast tract of willow bush-land situated only some ten blocks from the centre of the city, vacant and pulseless, though surrounded on four sides by a scattered population. A great paved roadway, like a crooked smile, runs across the face of it. Along the northern bank is a railway track over which an occasional train may be seen meandering gingerly. Above this again many bleary basements defacing the beautiful bank. The flat itself a thing of gently rolling surface and timbered edge. Here is the golfer in his white flannels. Here is many a cool spot where the grass encroaches on the poplar bluff. Higher up, if one wishes to explore farther afield, there are leafy dells which nevertheless give sight of the busy thoroughfare of the great bridge, that over-leaps the valley at its Eastern end, with its never ceasing coming and going. Opposite, on the southern bank, stands the nucleus of a great University. And again there is the river vista, this time superb, where the Saskatchewan makes a wide enchanting turn—and there, too, the little whispering woods.

The Edmonton of to-day, many-hued and magnetic, calls to the tribes and peoples of the earth with the sparkling lure of youth and riches. But in the Edmonton of yesterday rang the call that carries an age-old lure. In it there was a note of danger which is the preface to curiosity—and so to adventure, and a world of wealth beyond.

She threw back her head and looked up at the glittering sky. She felt deeply happy, deeply content. She was no longer burdened with a sensation of sadness. Now she knew the cause of it. How foolish she had been. She had made up her mind, and something deep within her had shrunk from her decision. It had cast a veil of sadness over her. Now in her mind as well as in her heart, she knew where her true happiness lay. She took a long breath of the soft sweet air.

New Ways with Summer Vegetables

By Frances M. McNally

WITH increasing knowledge of the science of nutrition; green vegetables have been brought into the limelight as never before. They are now recognized as an essential of an adequate diet. Their value lies, not in any large quantity of nutrients, but in small quantities of special materials which they provide and the bulk which they give the diet. The proportion of the mineral substances, which the body requires, and the vitamins which increase the resistance to disease is greater than in most other sorts of food. Their value is not are ready for the saucepan. Use boiling salted water to cook them and just enough to cover them. Bring them rapidly to the boiling point, then reduce the temperature and just simmer until tender. Prepared in this way and dressed with fresh butter and pepper and salt these vegetables make one of the most tempting of summer dishes. Blanching prevents much of the shrinkage of green vegetables and also brings out a vividness in color and a piquancy of flavour.

Tomatoes and Cucumbers are most popular as articles for making salads.

so much nutritive as health. They are protective foods and if the diet is lacking in them for a long time disease is apt to result. Green vegetables are also valuable for their appetizing qualities their flavour and appearance and the variety which they make possible. Every intelligent housewife when planning her daily meals will include an agreeable variety of the many summer vegetables. Fortunately the summer offers us a large number for choosing from—peas, beans, new potatoes, onions, asparagus, cucumbers, tomatoes, spinach and all of the other

Many people are of the opinion that no Summer salad is complete without tomato or cucumber forming a part of it. These vegetables, however, are with us for a longer time than peas and beans and there may be times when one desires a more unusual method of serving them. For such times the following recipes are suggested.

Baked Tomatoes. Select fine large tomatoes and cut a small piece from the stem end of each. In the cavity place a small piece of butter. Bake slowly for half an hour, take up and keep hot while greens. The hard cooking which we give to the coarser and hardier vegetables of the Autumn would be disastrous to these delicate green things. They have no hard woody fibre to soften, we have only to preserve their delicious flavour and color, and retain the beneficial mineral salts and sweet juices. If you wish to make your peas and beans and other Summer vegetables more delicious, try blanching them. After they have been looked over and washed, place them in a square of cheese cloth and plunge in unsalted boiling water. Allow them to remain in this bath for five minutes then plunge quickly into cold water and they Fried Tomatoes (Green or Ripe). Slice large tomatoes into three or four slices, rub with flour, fry in hot butter, browning on both sides. Dress with a sauce made of cream, butter and seasonings.

Stuffed Tomatoes. Take large firm tomatoes, cut a slice from the top of each and scrape out soft parts from the centre. Mix with stale bread crumbs, chopped ham, onion and parsley, allowing two tablespoons of bread crumbs and one

She was already curious about "Miss P. Smith" and (though it sounds conceited to say so) jealous. It wasn't, of course, that she set me up above other men; but I happened to be the only young man, and the sole Englishman within reach at the moment. She'd confessed to liking Englishmen; besides, I suppose it appealed to the romance—alias sentimentality—in a rather sloppy make up, that she had come to my rescue by giving her room to me. That wove a link between us; my winning for her at the Casino forged another. And as the girl had nothing on earth to do, she interested herself in my affairs—resented any separation in them from her own, and determined to resist it.

She had no doubt whatever that Miss P. Smith and Patchinka, little sister of dead Sacha Kapieha, were one and the same. She had heard a good deal of talk about Sacha Kapieha, since the purchase of his biplane for the War Orphans' Lottery, and its appearance in the Place du Casino for all the world to see. It was common knowledge that the machine had been left to Sacha's sister, provided that she claimed it within a year of his death. It hadn't been claimed. The French Government had a right to dispose of the biplane, and they had disposed of it for a good and charitable purpose. Why then had the girl turned up at Monte Carlo just before the time when the sale of tickets would begin?

Wendela Horden wasn't the daughter of Henry S. for nothing. Though she had a stolid side from her mother and a silly side from herself, she also had a sharp side from her father. She decided that, somehow or other, Sacha's sister still hoped to secure his Mascot, and that to do so safely an incognito was for some reasons necessary.

This would not, perhaps, have interested her much, even though Mendez had spoken of Kapieha as his "friend," and mentioned the aeroplane in a casual way, if I hadn't seemed to be mixed up in the business. I, who ought to be exclusively acting as Knight to Miss Horden, dared secretly to give my services to Another.

Luckily Wendela didn't meet Mendez and company again that afternoon; otherwise she might have taken them into her confidence without waiting to see me.

What she did was to stick doggedly to the Pension Rossi, on the excuse of having tea, really resolved not to stir without a glimpse of Miss Kapieha.

I brought Patchinka back to the pension at four o'clock as I'd promised the Iron Duke to hand over her charge before dark. We had visions of a sort of school-room tea in Miss Wellington's room, where we could freely discuss our adventures without being overheard. We may have made some noise on our arrival, for Petro was at his best on the scene of last night's triumph, and set us laughing in the hall. I was paying for our taxi when Wendela popped out of the salle a manger, bringing with her an odour of buttered toast and tea. She stared at Patchinka, smiled an "Ah, I've caught you, my Boy!" smile at me, as I turned. And—Tableau!

It was a brief tableau, however, and became at once a Transformation scene. Patchinka went quietly upstairs, Petro stayed and sniffed at Wendela's boots from the Hague; Wendela, not being used to British bulldogs, squealed; and I, wishing nothing so devoutly as that Petro might play whale to her Jonah—was obliged to call the dog off.

Miss Horden, whimpering, said that as I had recommended the Pension Rossi through the 'phone, she'd come over to have a look at the place. I passionately denied recommending it. We then had "words," as they say in servant-circles, Miss Horden accusing me of rudeness, I defending myself not too gently; and then, with a burst of tears out popped the secret: Patchinka's real name discovered quite by accident.

Instantly I realised that a weeping maiden in a taxi alone with one man, is less dangerous than in a Pension where every door, if not wall, has ears. She'd kept her cab waiting, but I sent it away, and taking Wendela by the arm firmly led her to my taxi, I fancied as we drove away, that Patchinka was at the window, understanding the whole situation, and more impishly amused than compassionate.

This conversation did not incline me to leniency with Wendela. Perhaps I was severe—as one somehow is to these plump, white, moon-faced girls when they dissolve in tears, and blow their noses unpicturesquely. I fear I missed a chance of keeping the enemy in subjection; for, goaded to fury by some remark of mine which she thought "cruel," Wendela threatened to tell "everyone" that Miss P. Smith was Miss Kapieha.

"Senor Mendez and that handsome Monsieur Dupont, and Signor Moroni will be awfully interested," she smiled. "And they're lots nicer to me than you are. I don't know really why I have anything to do with you at all."

That showed me where I stood. Or rather, it showed me where I groveled. And there, I made my big mistake. If I'd believed half about women that I'd read of them in novels, I would have kept the whip hand over Miss Horden from that moment on, instead of letting her hold it over me. But Patchinka—brave little Patchinka—had a dread of Mendez. I had laughed at it, yet I felt its contagion, and the thought of trouble for her sake made me weak.

Instead of defying Wendela, I temporised. I told her that Miss Kapieha was a protegee of Henry S. who had been interested in Sacha. I said that Wendela had better be careful, or she'd upset a cherished scheme of her father's.

At this she turned up her nose, which was by now shining and red.

"Pooh!" she retorted. "I guess I'm more to Dad than any old cherished scheme! Blood's stronger than water. If he has to choose between Miss Kapieha and me—goodbye Miss Kapieha. So you'd both better look out and not make me too cross. I can be real nasty when I'm cross. I get that from my Mother, who knows just how to manage Dad."

I was sure of that. And I wasn't sure that the girl was not right about Henry S. Anyhow, she might be. And I wanted Patchinka's secret kept till she was ready to let it out of the bag.

We patched up a peace. I allowed Wendela to weep on my shoulder. Stiffly I patted hers, while yearning to shake the girl. She promised to say nothing to anyone about Miss Kapieha, and I promised in return that I would be "nice again" to Miss Horden.

Being "nice," I soon found meant giving her tea at the Hotel de Paris in the afternoon, and taking her to the Casino at night, at least once every three days. And on top of all, the abominable girl trailed Patchinka and me to the Flying School.

This, she said, was a coincidence. It was not till later that she confessed her interview with Madame Rossi. She had happened, she vowed, to be taking a drive alone, at Nice, and had seen us turn into the grounds. Remembering that she'd always wanted to fly, she decided to enquire there and then, about having some flights, with professionals.

I prayed to all my stars that the girl would funk when the time came for the experiment. But no, her Dutch blood saved her. She was not sick, and she was not scared; though this immunity from "nerves" meant that Miss Horden felt no such thrill of rapture as that which came to me, after my first experience with the cold potato. She was stolidly calm in flight; professed to "like" the sensation, and to intend repeating it. After that, she was always hanging about the flying ground when Patchinka, Petro and I were there.

Unhealthy gums denoted by tenderness and bleeding

UNHEALTHY soil kills the best of wheat. Unhealthy gums kill the best of teeth. To keep the teeth sound keep the gums well. Watch for tender and bleeding gums. This is a symptom of Pyorrhea which afflicts four out of five people over forty.

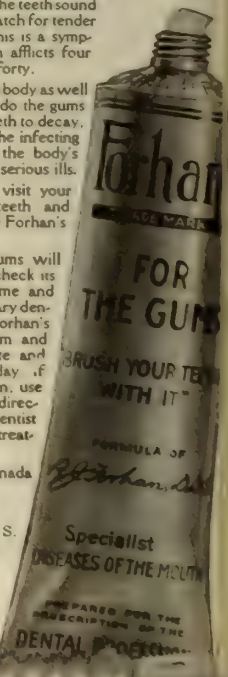

Pyorrhea menaces the body as well as the teeth. Not only do the gums recede and cause the teeth to decay, loosen and fall out, but the infecting Pyorrhea germs lower the body's vitality and cause many serious ills.

To avoid Pyorrhea, visit your dentist frequently for teeth and gum inspection. And use Forhan's For the Gums.

Forhan's For the Gums will prevent Pyorrhea—or check its progress—if used in time and used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices cannot do this. Forhan's will keep the gums firm and healthy, the teeth white and clean. Start using it today. If gum shrinkage has set in, use Forhan's according to directions, and consult a dentist immediately for special treatment.

FOR THE GUMS

How can we sell this wonderful Baby Book for only 35 cents?

For two reasons:

We are sure that every mother who brings up her baby in accordance with its practical, scientific advice will be a good friend of ours all her life. Friendship is the best investment we know.

But the book is also an expression of our gratitude to babies. Babies have been good customers of ours for nearly half a century.

Mennen Borated Talcum has kept three generations of babies happy—has soothed and protected their fat little legs and bodies.

And in the last three years, Kora-Konia also has won its way into the nursery. As you probably know, Kora-Konia is amazingly efficient for prickly heat, chafing, baby rashes and all severe skin irritations. It forms a waterproof, velvety film which clings for hours, protecting while it heals.

Kora-Konia is not a talcum.

We hope you will send 35 cents at once for your copy of Aunt Belle's Baby Book

She was introduced to "Miss Smith," of course. That she managed without difficulty. And Patchinka—who was practising every day—offered sweetly to "take her up." The invitation was refused, however, and naturally not repeated. Yet Wendela need have had no fear. Patchinka had forgotten nothing of her skill as an air-woman, and pilot.

As for me, Wendela waited not to be asked. I was her "Boy," and she had a right to my services. Perhaps I ought to have admired her pluck, and been grateful for her trust, for the third time I flew alone she offered to accompany me. "If you don't want to have me," she added, "I'll get Amedeo Dupont to come over. He's fearfully interested in aeroplanes, and is forever talking about them in those nice long chats we have these days, when you're here at Nice. He'd love to meet Miss Kap—I mean Miss Smith."

Needless to say I took the lady up. Equally needless to say I was loth to bring her down. There ought to be layers of cloud, like top shelves of cupboards, where an airman could leave unwanted passengers "to be kept till called for."

I didn't wish to spend my extra half-hour in bed thinking of Miss Horden, though I lay beneath her eiderdown. But my mind would turn in her direction, brooding over my grievances. It must have been the same with Sinbad, when trying to forget that the Old Man of the Sea was not a light weight.

"I'll buy her beastly tickets for her," I told myself grudgingly, "but I won't give her any of the numbers we want. I don't see why I should."

Then, mentally freeing myself from the incubus, I switched my thoughts off and sent them to Cap Martin.

I wondered if Patchinka were asleep, and felt that she wasn't. I imagined the tingle of an electric cord vibrating between us. She, too, was going to buy tickets; so was Miss Wellington. They would buy at Cap Martin, in the Grand Hotel; and at Mentone, I would buy at Monte Carlo. All three of us would buy at Nice.

Each ticket seller would be entrusted with a book of tickets, and each book would contain a certain "series" of numbers. We wished to possess tickets taken from as many different series as possible; but it was awkward that both Patchinka and Wendela "felt in their bones" that the best winning numbers would be found in the "seventeen series."

Patchinka's bones were infinitely more important to me than my own or any other bones on earth or under it; whereas Wendela's were of as little importance as human bones could be. Yet Wendela had bidden me buy all I could for her in the seventeen series; anything from seventeen hundred up to eighteen hundred; and beginning again at seventeen thousand up to eighteen thousand.

Just how I was to manage without sacrificing Patchinka, or, on the contrary, "letting Wendela down flat" I didn't quite see. That was one of the subjects which pressed upon my thoughts during the extra half-hour in bed. And, last but not least, was the subject of Laurette de Fiumine.

Not once, since her first escapade, had Patchinka been able to get in touch with the Marchesa. The break in the fence and the hole underneath had been promptly repaired. A call of enquiry for Laurette's health at the porter's lodge had ended in the civil reply "Madame est toujours un peu souffrante;" had ended as though in a cul de sac.

The La Dugas had refused to attempt another adventure on the same lines as the first; but Patchinka would not have been Patchinka if she had abandoned hope.

Had it been for Laurette's sake alone, the girl would still have worked to reach her again—to rescue her, if possible, from what she believed to be virtual imprisonment. Yet there were selfish considerations as well. Not only might Laurette

A beautiful skin is Miss Canada's Birthright

Any Canadian girl can achieve it

The Choice is with her own self—

A little care and knowledge of how to treat the skin, a little care and judgment in the selection of her toilet soap, just a little determination to make the most of herself, to help nature beautify her and—her skin may glow with the radiance of health and beauty. Her complexion, free from blackheads, pimples, blemishes, etc., will give her wonderful new attraction for her friends—make her beautiful in fact.

Skin cleansing is ALL important

This is not a lecture against the use of rouge and powders. They are good, but the great danger lies in using them over and over again without thoroughly cleansing the skin between each application. Thus, an artificial "skin" of grease, grit and perspiration is formed which clogs up the pores, resulting in a coarse, sallow, sickly skin.

WINSOME—the soap paramount

Naturally, the soap is very important. A soap, with cheap, impure materials, or too quickly and improperly made, may cleanse the skin but will do more harm than good. Choose Winsome, the new toilet soap—most pleasant to use, for you can always depend on its supreme quality, its gentle cleansing power, its wonderful purity.

A simple WINSOME treatment

Make a lather in warm water with Winsome Soap. Use both hands and gently massage every inch of the face and neck, work the fingers into the skin and take a little time to it. Then rinse thoroughly and dry with a soft towel. If your skin is naturally dry, use a little Vinolia Vanishing Cream before you wash, and a little after. If your skin is naturally oily, wash in warm water, but rinse in cold.

Keep this up daily and neither rouges or powders, nor rough winds or hot sun, can injure your skin. Winsome Soap will make it naturally robust and glowing with colour and beauty.

diagonal ventilation during warm weather: abundant fresh air being one great stepping-stone to efficiency. For Summer ventilation, the windows should, of course, be equipped with full-size screens, in order that the sash may be lowered from the top to release the super-heated air near the ceiling of the kitchen.

However generous may be the storage space provided by adjoining pantries, an abundance of shelves, drawers and bins is necessary in the kitchen. Whether this requirement is met by a kitchen cabinet or by a built-in equipment is a matter of personal choice. The built-in equipment has in its favor, however, the possibility of an arrangement that perfectly responds to the needs of the owner.

A closet for pots and pans is likewise very desirable—if it can be incorporated logically in the plans. It should, of course, be located as near as possible to stooping. In choosing a range, too, consideration should be given to those which carry their ovens high enough to entail no bending. Glass in the doors of the range is also an aid to efficiency. But glass in its relation to a kitchen really deserves a separate paragraph!

Glass has a multitude of uses in the modern kitchen—and to each it is ideally adapted, because it is non-absorbent and easy to clean. Glass baking utensils, castors, towel-racks, shelves, door-knobs and table-tops—these all have a place. Glass-containers for food and cooking materials are sanitary, sensible and attractive; and they are efficient in revealing the quantity of stores on hand. And an array of these useful glass fitments unquestionably adds to the attractiveness of the kitchen.

If the refrigerator is to be placed in the kitchen, rather than in the entry or a

A high wainscoting of white tile forms an ideal backing for the coal-stove and the gas-range installed in this kitchen: and pale yellow paint finishes both the upper walls and the ceiling. An inlaid linoleum in light yellow, blue and terra-cotta is used for the floor-covering. Ventilation is promoted by a metal ventilator above the gas range, and by a diminutive window over the coal-stove. Still another interesting feature is the tiny closet, into which the hot water boiler has been fitted. Towel-racks affixed to the inside of the closet-door convert the closet into a splendid drying place for tea-towels, and there is still room for the storage of sundry pots and pans. The large hearth of cement extending well beyond the line of the two ranges is a fire-prevention equipment that warrants especial mention.

the range. It is an excellent idea to have the door of such a closet fitted with ventilating openings at top and bottom. If a little taste is exercised in their selection, well-made utensils of uniform material, whether aluminum, copper or enameled ware, are not in the least objectionable when hung in plain view near the range or over the sink—but the separate closet, nevertheless remains the better solution.

THE convenience of a kitchen can be immeasurably increased by care both in the selection and placement of each equipment. A sink provided with drain-boards obviously saves many steps when dishes are being washed—and, if the sink be placed a full three feet above the floor, it will also avoid much back-breaking separate closet, the logical position is against an exterior wall; as this allows the ice to be introduced from the outside, rather than after a dripping passage across the kitchen floor. And it is, after all, upon just such little details as this that the success or failure of a kitchen hinges!

Out of the Golden West has come the breakfast-nook: which, whether or not we individually accord it approbation, is to-day a feature of wide-spread popularity. Placed in the kitchen and used for the informal meals of the day, it does undoubtedly save many steps and considerable time—and, when its built-in seats and table are of good design and pleasing finish, the breakfast-nook distinctly enhances the decorative effect of the room.

For, be it known, the decorative phase of the kitchen is to the fore to-day! No longer is there the slightest excuse for dingy and drab monotony. 'Tis an era of cheerful coloring—and why should the gay hues of the present period be altogether excluded from the kitchen? True: if the kitchen communicates directly with the dining room, its color-scheme must be modified accordingly. On the other hand, if a pantry intervenes between the kitchen and the dining room, colorings both bright and distinctive can be very appropriately employed. One especially attractive little kitchen has a color-scheme of blue and gray carried out in an interesting manner. The walls and the ceiling are painted a warm French grey and the wood-work is finished in a paint of a clear bright blue hue. An inlaid linoleum in a blue-and-grey block pattern is used upon the floor and curtains of white dotted Swiss,

The treatment of the exposed surfaces in a kitchen requires infinite attention if the room is to accord with modern sanitary standards. It is apparent that, in a room dedicated to the preparation and storage of food, every surface should be washable. That points to the advantages of a paint or enamel finish for the walls and the ceiling, as well as for the wood-work: and there is much to be said in favor of a uniform finish and coloring. All-white, ivory, putty, fawn and gray are conservative, cheerful and clean-looking. Many people, while approving the use of paint for the walls and the ceiling, prefer to have the kitchen wood-work finished in oil and wax. This is less cheery in effect: but, as it is readily cleanable, it is entirely satisfactory.

A wainscoting of tile or cement is advantageous in the kitchen, although its cost is frequently prohibitive for the home

In this unusual built-in feature, to the conventional fittings of an ordinary kitchen-cupboard have been added the conveniences of the modern kitchen-cabinet. There is a well-supported baking board beneath the counter, and there is a bread-cutting board under the shelves. Bins for sugar and flour are also provided in one compartment. It will be noted, too, that the doors are of especially heavy construction, in order that their inner sides may be utilised for cooking utensils and some of the lighter-weight stores. Suitable drawers are also incorporated for cutlery and kitchen linens. The combined cupboard and cabinet is built entirely of hardwood, oiled and waxed to correspond with the standing woodwork of the room and with the other built-in features.

edged with narrow bands of burnt orange, are hung at all the windows. Blue-and-white china, grey crockery, aluminum cooking utensils and glass containers tone admirably with the unique coloring chosen for the room.

In still another kitchen, the walls, wood work and ceiling are painted alike in a soft, restful gray-green—a suitable choice, because the room happens to be unusually well-lighted. The floor-covering is of linoleum in white, gray-green and black: and the window-hangings are of frilled white muslin, dotted with green. And, from some happy inspiration, the owner of this satisfying room has green-painted pots of blooming scarlet geraniums in the kitchen-windows throughout all the long months of Winter! Flowers have a gentle, mellowing influence wherever they appear: therefore, their good cheer should never be denied the kitchen.

of moderate size. As a backing for the range, and if possible for the sink as well, either cement or tile is desirable, if for nothing else than as a means of promoting cleanliness. For the same reason, a tile or cement floor is especially suitable for the kitchen—particularly when laid to form a rounded union with the washboard surrounding the room. A masonry floor, however, is apt to be tiring to the feet: and, on that account, the wooden floor has never lost its place in popular favor.

If a hardwood floor is desired, maple is probably the most satisfactory choice. One of the new linoleum rugs of room-size can be used over such a floor, as the manufacturers guarantee these rugs to lie flat without fastening. Furthermore, the linoleum rugs are now obtainable in a host of delightful and distinctive colorings have the pearls, and Sacha's papers taken from the bank (though those prophetic "bones" of Patchinka's were true to the "Mascot" hiding-place) but the stored petrol, if it existed, might one day save a situation for us. There was every incentive for Patchinka and for me to find some way of helping the Marchesa, or in any case getting her to help us.

"Think—think!" Patchinka urged. "Think when you're ready to go to sleep; think, try for inspiration in your dreams. Think, and try and remember the inspiration when you wake up."

So I tried, but the morning of the ticket sale I had thought of too many other things first. I couldn't do the Laurette affair justice under Wendela's eiderdown. I must get up, I told myself and—then and there the inspiration came.

It was really an inspiration, I was pretty sure—not a dud. There was no time, however, to work out its details just then, I must lay it away in my brain with the label "Needing attention," until I had emptied my pockets of money and filled them with lottery tickets. Then I would work it into shape, and submit it in the form of a Plan, to Patchinka.

CHAPTER XXVI.

No. 1717.

THAT day and the next few days were chiefly spent by Patchinka, Miss Wellington and me, in buying lottery tickets at five francs each.

We bought Mentone, Monte Carlo, Beaulieu, and Nice. We even went west as far as Cannes, hoping to find series of numbers which eluded us elsewhere.

We bought in the Atrium of the Casino at Monte. We bought everywhere in hotels, cafes and shops. Whenever we found the "seventeen series" we were gay; when large blocks of it were missing like bits out of a jigsaw puzzle, we were sad. To get what we sought no neighborhood was neglected, no winnings (mine) left unspent. At last, when our orgy of buying stopped it was because all the tickets which we hadn't got, apparently someone else had.

Sacha Kapiha's Mascot was not everybody's choice. The first prize, of money, was the great attraction; and besides the two leading sensations, there was a large glass case brilliantly lit up, displayed in the Atrium at the Casino. This contained all the remaining prizes of the lottery, beginning with the third in value: that diamond tiara (designed by a famous jeweller) upon which Wendela said she had set her heart.

She never spoke of wishing to win the aeroplane, which would indeed be a white elephant for her; but she was extraordinarily keen on collecting tickets. The seventeen series was her choice as well as Patchinka's, perhaps only by coincidence; perhaps because all women at Monte Carlo have a fetish worship for seventeen; perhaps because she's found out in some way that Miss Kapiha fancied the series.

Mendez, Maroni, and Dupont were all buying for Miss Horden, yet not one of us did she trust. She suspected (and rightly) that we were out for ourselves, and did as much buying as she could on her own account.

Among the prizes in the glass case was a dressed doll which, according to Patchinka, was the image of Miss Horden. "Wendela," she secretly named it, and the plump, round-faced, blue-eyed, flaxen-haired figure in elaborate white had an unpleasant fascination for us. Its light eyes seem to say "You'll win me, you know! You can't avoid me. I'll be yours whether you want me or not."

On the last afternoon of the ticket-sale Patchinka and I stopped before the display of prizes, hypnotized by the doll's stare.

"If you win Wendela I shall take an awful revenge," the girl said, with that pretty roll of the "r" I never tired of hearing. "I will be like the witches who made wax images of people, and—"

"Did I catch my name, Miss Kap—Miss Smith?" a too well known voice enquired behind us.

Patchinka turned, and smiled. "You speak as if it were a microbe!" she gently laughed. "We have named this smart doll after you. We think Captain Malet may win her."

Wendela wasn't sure whether she'd been flattered or insulted; so the safe thing was to blush self-consciously and change the subject.

"Oh!" she sniffed. "Well, he deserves to win something, considering all the tickets he's bought. And by the way, Boy, what about my seventeens? You promised—"

"Sorry! But I didn't promise," I hastily cut in, hating to be her "boy," but unable to protest against the annexation.

"What! You didn't promise to get me all of the seventeen series you could? Why—"

"You asked me to get you 'all I could,' and I have got all I could. I handed the last over yesterday."

"You got me one little beastly book 1700 to 1716. What I wanted more than any other number was 1717."

"Somebody else has got that," I said. "Ah! Who body else?—that's what I'd like to know."

"Search me!" I shrugged my shoulders.

"I expect I'd be more likely to find the missing number if I searched Miss Kapiha. You always give her the titbits of everything! I do think you might have more gratitude if nothing else! If it hadn't been for me you wouldn't even have a room to live in at Monte Carlo. And I gave you the best eiderdown—"

"Don't throw an eiderdown in Captain Malet's face for the sake of a lottery ticket, Miss Horden!" begged Patchinka. "It would be so—stuffy! You see, I asked him before you did, to get me all he could of the seventeen series. So he had to give me my choice and pass on the left over ones to you. It wasn't his fault. But I'm sorry you are cross. For the sake of Mr. Horden who has been so good to us, I will give you No. 1717, which you say you want more than any other number, if that will satisfy you and make you happy?"

"I don't see why you should give it to her," I protested. "Mr. Horden would be the last one to ask you to do so. He'd tell his daughter not to take the ticket. He'd say it wasn't sporting of her. That sounds more like him!"

"Well, it doesn't sound like me to refuse it," snapped Wendela, "and I'm not going to. Because the way I see things, it's my right, and Miss Kap—Miss Smith is only doing me justice in giving the ticket to me."

"I don't 'give it up' in the sense you mean," said Patchinka. "But I do in my sense; I sacrifice it. Is not my English good, Captain Malet? I have the fine shades."

"I don't want your fine shades," objected Miss Horden, slightly puzzled. "And I don't want the ticket as a present from you Miss Kap—Smith. I'll pay you for it. I'll pay you double, or quadruple if you like."

"Oh, but I don't like!" Patchinka cried. "I will not sell that ticket. I will give it—or keep it myself."

Wendela looked more like the fat-cheeked doll than ever as she reflected what to do. I think she would have liked best to stamp her foot, scream, bash Patchinka's pretty hat over a scornful little face, snatch the ticket from between finger and thumb of a small grey glove, and bolt. But these things are not done, or at least very seldom done, in the Atrium of the Casino at Monte Carlo. Therefore what Wendela did was to swallow heavily, take the number 1717 from Patchinka as a suspicious dog takes a bone from a hand which has teased it, and snarl "Thank you very much. I don't suppose it will win anything. And even if it does it's spoiled."

for me now. But I darsay you mean well."

"I don't," said Patchinka to me, when Miss Horden had turned with dignity towards the door of the Salle Schmidt. "I don't mean well. And she knows I don't. But—I just had to do it. You understand, mon ami Duguesclin?"

"I suppose I do," I agreed. "But I hate your doing it all the same. What if it wins the—"

"Oh, don't say it!" Patchinka stopped me. "That would be too bad to be true. And so it won't be true. Such things do not happen."

But also, sometimes they do. One of them happened that night. When the winning numbers were read out at twelve o'clock in the Atrium, 1717 was the gainer of Sacha Kapieha's aeroplane.

Out of all our hundreds of tickets there were only three winners. Between us, Patchinka, Miss Wellington and I were the possessors of a silver gilt manicure set, the realistic statue of a black boy holding a plate for cards, and—the doll.

CHAPTER XXVII.
The Look.

WENDELA was not in the Casino. She and I had had a "scene" at the British Hotel, outside her bedroom door in the dimly lit passage where she waited to pounce on me with reproaches. My line of defence enraged her. Suddenly she burst into tears, hoped she might die because then I'd be sorry; bounded into her room and slammed the door hard.

Such sorrow as I might have felt was mitigated by the sight of a well-supplied dinner-tray going in to the sufferer. She must have forgotten, I thought, that the winning numbers of the War Orphan Lottery would be read out in the Atrium when the Rooms closed at midnight; or else she had no real faith after all in 1717. In any case, it wasn't my business to remind her; and little dreaming what was to come I walked out of the hotel whistling with joy at my release.

Patchinka and Miss Wellington dined with me at a quiet little restaurant. We pretended not to be excited. We talked of everything except the lottery; but, as all roads lead to Rome, so all our subjects seemed to lead sooner or later to the biplane. Even the topic of the railway strike menace brought us to Sacha's Masop. If we could win it, or buy it from the winner, my wonderful plan—the plan first conceived in far off Boumemouth—might actually come true! But—failure to get the machine spelled failure all round.

Even my inspiration concerning the Lady of Villa Persane (which by this time Patchinka had heard and approved) would be wasted, so far as our interests were concerned. We might still try to carry it out for the sake of Laurette; but bereft of the biplane not all the secret stores of essence on earth could help us.

We lingered over coffee as long as we could, then decided to while away the remaining hours of suspense in the Casino theatre, at the Russian ballet. When the curtain fell, however, there was still a bad quarter of an hour to go through. We streamed with the crowd into the Atrium where we killed the time in reading the latest news: "Railway strike said to be certain." Oh, to think of the fun and the money and the great adventure which might be ours—or might not!

"Please give me a cigarette," said Patchinka.

Miss Wellington's eyebrows went up; but the girl—generally obedient to provincial scruples—was obstinate. She smoked daintily, her face expressionless, her grey-green eyes inscrutable; but her hand trembled.

Never could the Atrium have been more densely packed. People were laughing and chattering loudly in various languages, but smiles were strained as are those of gamblers when high stakes lie on the table. Then somebody called out something, and silence fell; in sonorous French

The Hoover is guaranteed to prolong the life of rugs

For Your Children's Sake

The indoor playgrounds of your children are the rugs. There, at home, under watchful eyes, your babies seem safe—but are they? In the depths of your rugs hides danger. For, unless regularly beaten out, the street dirt which shoes track in, finds a haven there. Germs breed in it. Little fingers, poking playfully into those insanitary depths, are contaminated. Mysterious illnesses often result.

Dusty sweeping is also risky. It scatters germs into the air that all must breathe. It causes rugs to appear clean and safe when only the surface dirt has been disturbed.

Especially for your children's sake, thoroughly clean your rugs at least weekly. Do it dustlessly, easily, rapidly, with The Hoover.

The Hoover beats out all that germ-laden dirt from rug depths where, under foot, it would grind off the nap.

In the same operation, The Hoover also electrically sweeps up every vestige of clinging litter, erects crushed nap, freshens colors and powerfully cleans by air. The new Hoover air-cleaning attachments are recommended in addition.

Have a free home demonstration of The Hoover and its exclusive process which is endorsed by carpet authorities and guaranteed by us to preserve all rugs from wear.

Write us for names of Authorized Dealers—the only dealers licensed to demonstrate, sell and service Hoovers backed by our Guarantee Bond. The Hoover is obtainable in three sizes, each moderately priced. Convenient terms gladly extended. For your children's protection, act now.

and patterns innumerable. Through their use, therefore, any individualistic color-scheme can be developed. They are, of course, equally well-adapted to a soft-wood floor of painted or stained finish.

The quaint rag rugs of our grandmother's day are also appropriate for kitchen use: more particularly now, when vacuum cleaners have reached such a stage of reliability and general excellence. Indeed, attractive effects can be secured through the use of both the rag rugs and linoleum: especially when a linoleum of block-pattern or plain color is employed, with the more colorful rag rugs as interesting notes of accent.

The ideal modern kitchen is never a repository for discarded furniture—though years ago the average kitchen seemed to be reserved especially for furniture that had outlived its usefulness in the other and more spectacular rooms of the house. As a matter of fact, there should be no furniture in the kitchen that is not actually necessary. A good working table is, of all the movable furniture, perhaps the most important. Preferably, it should be equipped with castors for convenient moving about and with a glass or composition top for cleanliness. The table should, of course, be severely plain in lines: and that is applicable to any other furniture selected for a kitchen, as carvings, indentations, scrollwork or other ornamentation invariably invite the lodgment of dirt—and dirt must never be allowed to invade the realm of culinary art and practice!

Of late years, notable strides have been made in the designing of kitchen furniture—and this is probably attributable in part to the vogue of painted ware of all sorts. In any event, the most appealing of the new kitchen furniture is painted: frequently in white or ivory, but often in gayer colors with contrasting lines and floral decorations. One charming little set shown this season is painted in parchment yellow, with very narrow lines of peacock blue and tiny medallions in jade green, coral and peacock blue on an ivory ground. Pretty enough for a Summer living room! Why not? Has a kitchen no claim to beauty when so many waking hours of a housewife's life must be spent within its four walls?

Can you not picture the soul-satisfying effect of that parchment yellow furniture in a kitchen having walls and woodwork of soft old ivory tint and a floor-covering of linoleum in cream-and-black? With curtains of sheer ivory scrim fluttering at every window, that kitchen could be naught but a source of perpetual joy to its owner. And what kitchen is truly successful which is anything less than that?

Whenever a teacher in the sixth grade of a certain public school was obliged to leave the room, he always left one of his pupils in charge of the class. One day he called Janet to act as monitor. "Keep order, Janet," he admonished her as he left her at his desk.

Some time later, hearing a great commotion in his room, he hastened back and softly opened the door. At that instant a boy burst from the cloak-room and dashed down the aisle. After him clattered Janet, thwacking him with the blackboard pointer. While the other pupils cheered lustily, Janet and the boy ran up one aisle and down another, and at every step Janet breathlessly demanded, "How dare you leave your seat?" At last the boy, having got much the worst of it, was glad to slide into his place. A congratulatory shout from the delighted spectators hailed Janet's triumph.

As the little disciplinarian turned to take her place at the desk she saw the teacher and marched straight to him and handed him the pointer.

"That boy went to the cloak-room without asking my permission," she said. "You asked me to keep order, and I sure did."

"That's right, Janet," he replied. "I heard it."

teaspoon of chopped ham for each tomato. Place in a pan, containing one teaspoon of butter for each tomato. Bake in a moderate oven until tender, basting occasionally.

Tomato Pudding. Grease a pudding dish, place in it first a layer of sliced ripe tomatoes, then a layer of bread crumbs and grated cheese and so continue until the dish is full, finishing with the crumbs and cheese. Dot with butter and bake twenty minutes.

Cucumbers Au Gratin. Take three small young cucumbers and peel, rub well with salt and then wash them and boil quickly for twenty minutes, in boiling, slightly salted water, drain thoroughly. Put into a saucepan one tablespoon of butter with one tablespoon of flour, mix till smooth then gradually add one-half cup of milk and one-half cup of cream. Stir till boiling then add a few drops of lemon juice, three tablespoons of grated cheese and cook for five minutes. Arrange cucumbers on a dish, pour sauce over them and serve.

Cucumbers A la Poulette. Pare two cucumbers, cut them in halves, and with a spoon scoop out the seeds. Cut each half into three pieces, crosswise, cover with boiling salted water and cook until tender. Drain, reserving one cup of the liquid. Melt two tablespoons of butter. Add two tablespoons of flour and when well blended add the liquid from the cucumbers, stir until boiling, add one half teaspoon of salt, and a dash of pepper and pour slowly on the beaten yolk of one egg. Return to the fire, cook a minute longer, add one tablespoon of lemon juice and the pieces of cucumber, heat thoroughly and serve.

Moulded Cucumber Jelly. Cut two medium sized cucumbers into very thin slices, add one slice of onion, one-half teaspoon of salt, one-eighth teaspoon pepper and one pint of water. Simmer until the cucumber is tender. Soak one tablespoon of granulated gelatine in one tablespoon cold water, add to the first mixture and strain. Line a mould with slices of cold cucumbers, then pour in the jelly. When firm and very cold serve in a bed of lettuce with French or Mayonnaise dressing.

There are various green leaves or stalks to be had from among the wayside wild things, or from kitchen garden supplies, which, when cooked, become palatable and edible and are very valuable for food. Dandelion greens aid as a blood purifier and tonic and when young are deliciously appetizing. Spinach is so rich in mineral salts and purifying powers that it has been called "The broom of the stomach." Tender rhubarb leaves, the tops of young beets, Swiss chard, and that form of brake known as fiddle head all make delicious greens and supply the mineral elements and vitamins needed in our systems.

To Keep Greens Fresh. Wash them thoroughly in cold water. If wilted soak for about ten minutes, drain and place on a large colander covered with a wet cloth. Place in a cool spot.

To Cook Greens. Use only enough water to prevent sticking to the bottom of the kettle, before the juice begins to be drawn out. Remember that the juice contains the most valuable portion of the vegetable. When greens are partly tender add salt. Cook until very tender, then take out both juice and greens and chop very fine. Reheat adding butter and seasonings.

Timbale of Asparagus. Wash the asparagus and blanch, cook until tender, saving the liquid when draining it. Strain this through a fine sieve or cheese cloth. To two cups of liquid add a tablespoon of granulated gelatine, which has soaked in cold water. Season to taste. Arrange stalks of asparagus around the sides of a mould charlotte russe fashion. Cool the jelly and when it has not quite reached the point of congealing, add a few pieces of asparagus, rubbed through a sieve, several bits of pimento and a cup of whipped cream. Pour this into the asparagus lined mould and place it away to chill. When ready to serve turn it out on a platter. Serve with Mayonnaise dressing if desired. The timbale is excellent without dressing.

Asparagus Au Gratin. One cup of asparagus tips, one-half cup white sauce, one tablespoon grated cheese, one egg yolk, one tablespoon cream, a few drops of lemon juice, salt, pepper and paprika to taste. Boil the asparagus tips in boiling salted water till tender, then drain. Heat the sauce, add cheese, seasonings, yolk of egg, cream and asparagus. Place in a casserole cover with buttered crumbs and place in oven until crumbs are browned.

Creamed Radishes. Slice thin and soak in salt water for two hours, boil in fresh slightly salted water till tender, drain, pour over them a cream sauce let simmer five minutes and serve.

A wainscoting of paneled wood surrounds the lower walls of this little dining room, and built-in seats flank the group of leaded casement windows. The upper walls are adorned by a paper of unusual charm: its conventionalized fruit design developed in delicate tones of rose, blue and green on an apricot background. A narrow wood moulding tops the paper at ceiling height and faint ivory paint finishes the ceiling. The ruffled, tied-back glass-curtains are of white dotted Swiss: the straight inner hangings and the shaped lambrequins of poplin in old blue, edged with a narrow fringe of apricot hue. The one large rug has a small all-over pattern in two shades of blue with a conventional border in a darker blue.

the winning numbers of the Lottery were announced by a black-coated personage of the Principality.

There was applause. The winner of the big money prize—a Parisian journalist—was cheered. There were calls for the winner of Kapiha's biplane; and it was only then I realised what Wendela's absence might mean.

"Good heavens, I must see her at once!" I exclaimed. "There isn't a minute to spare. Will you come with me to the hotel, or—"

"But it's after midnight, and she'll be in BED!" broke in Miss Wellington. "You can't—"

"He must!" cried Patchinka.

"If I don't, somebody else will," I groaned. "Already they've got time to get there if they took a taxi the minute they heard—or they may be telephoning."

"They," repeated the Iron Duke.

"Who—"
"Mendez, and Dupont and Maroni, of course," Patchinka explained hastily, the first time I had seen her impatient with her chaperon. "They'll get to Miss Horden if they have to climb in at her window; that is they will if they know she had Number 1717. But do they know?"

"They do," I said. "I'm dead sure. Dupont walked home from here with Wendela. She told me so, when we had that slanging match outside her door. Seemed to think I'd care—"

"Oh, we know what she thinks," wailed Patchinka. "If we only knew what she'll do!"

"I'll jolly soon find out," I tried to be reassuring. "If those three sweeps can rout a girl out of bed in the middle of the night I can. I'm sorry I got ratty with her. But she started in, and deserved all I gave her. It was more her fault than mine, and she can't refuse to sell us the—"

"It is my fault," Patchinka moaned. "The whole dreadful thing is my fault. What a fool, to give away 1717! Something warned me at the time not to do it. Maybe it was Sacha's spirit. But I wouldn't listen."

"You did it to stop Wendela from black-guarding me," I caught the blame on the rebound. "Who could have dreamed, out of all our numbers, that one—"

"Couldn't you make Miss Horden give it back?" ventured the Iron Duke. "I'm sure in her place, I'd refuse to win a prize on a ticket given me by the very one who wanted the thing most—and had the best right to it."

"Ah, but unluckily for us you're not in her place," I reminded the good woman. "The ticket is hers, come by fairly from her point of view, and it'll be nuts to Wendela that she got it from Miss Kapiha. I must be off to the hotel at once and force my way to her somehow, by fair means or foul."

"Oh, not foul!" begged Miss Wellington, gravely apprehensive.

"Nothing would be foul that wins for me my brother's aeroplane!" exclaimed Patchinka. "I could kill myself for my own foolishness. I could kill Wendela Horden because she takes advantage of it."

"If anyone kills her it had better be me," I said, with as small regard for grammar as morals. "But—" with a glance at the Iron Duke's prayerful face, "let's hope it won't come to that. I'll try bribery and corruption first, if she's troublesome."

"She will be troublesome, mon Duguesclin, very troublesome," Patchinka sighed. "Yet you may master her!—who knows? Come. We will all taxi to your hotel. Miss Wellington and I will wait, no matter how long, for news. If we are needed, you can call us. But oh, be quick—be quick."

By this time I had blazed a trail for us through the crowd, and we were on the Casino steps. Before us was the brilliantly illuminated Place, and Sacha's aeroplane, forever—it seemed—removed beyond his sister's reach. This was its last night in its present conspicuous resting place. The machine had ceased to be the property of the Administration. It belonged to the winner of ticket 1717, as those persons who hadn't learned tonight in the Casino would read in the newspapers tomorrow morning.

"What have I done?" muttered Patchinka, her face marble-white in the electric blaze, her eyes dark and tragic. "If that girl had won by any other number it would be bad enough, but not as bad as this. That I should make her a gift of Sacha's biplane! He will never forgive me."

"There's nothing to forgive," I said. "Trust me! By hook or by crook I'll get you that aeroplane, in spite of Wendela Horden and in spite of the Syndicate. It's up to me!"

Patchinka did not answer, but she gave me a look. No English girl, no American girl—perhaps none save a Polish girl—could have given just such a look. I don't know why others couldn't, and I shall never be able to prove the assertion; but I know I'm right.

It was a wonderful look; a look of passion and promise. I had never dared hope definitely that Patchinka Kapiha could love me as I felt she was capable of loving, though I'd always meant to try and make her do it. But that look told me (I thought) that she might love even me, with all of her self, heart, body and strong soul. It seemed to say: "Get me my brother's aeroplane that I have thrown away, and I will adore you as only such women as I can adore a man," were the words which seemed to flash to my heart.

I felt giddy for a second. I think I staggered. Nothing that happened afterwards is clear to me till we were in a taxi flying towards the British Hotel. It would have been a walk of ten or twelve minutes. It would be a drive of two. And each minute counted—unless we misjudged the Syndicate.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"Bible Oaths."

THE British Hotel at Monte Carlo never closes its eyes and falls quietly asleep. There is always a coming and going. Doors slam. People returning from the Sports Club or a dance at a night restaurant chat in the corridors. Being awake themselves, their imagination cannot conceive that others may wish to sleep.

Often, I'd been among the late ones in the service of my hard task-mistress but when I had by chance got in before midnight, only sheer exhaustion could conquer the noise persisting through the small hours.

Wendela Horden, however could sleep through an avalanche, so she had told me. "May this night," I prayed, "be no exception to her rule!" If she'd been "deep in her downy," as she called it, there was hardly time yet for her to have been roused by phone or knocking, to have dressed herself, and to have accepted the offer from the Syndicate for the aeroplane.

I used these arguments to comfort Patchinka; but leaving her and the Iron Duke hidden in the darkness of our taxi, I bolted into the hall to come upon Wendela, sitting there cosily with Dupont. She was dressed in a smart evening dress, and looked almost pretty, with a bright colour on her usually pale, plump cheeks. She was gay, and chatting fifteen to the dozen. She always did have a rush of conversation to the head!

Involuntarily I stopped short. My blood poured to my head and tingled in the tips of my ears. The girl and I had parted on bad terms, and now, here was this man with her. Perhaps she would refuse to speak to me!.....My lips parted but no word left them.

Miss Horden smiled. Not one of those winning smiles she employed occasionally after a quarrel. Rather was it a smile of malice. Her eyes almost sparkled, blue marbles can sparkle.

"Hellow!" she hailed me, as I stood with my back against the door. "I suppose you've hurried home to congratulate me, Captain Malet."

"I—er—I was afraid—I mean thought—you'd be in bed," I fumbled.

"I was going to bed," she condescended. "I had the most awful headache!" But Monsieur Dupont and Senior Mendez were so kind. They were dining together here and when I didn't show up they asked after my health. The waiter said I was in my room, so they sent me up nice messages, and reminded me about the announcement of the prize numbers tonight. My head was so bad, I'd actually forgotten! Well, we exchanged several notes, by the femme de chambre, and waiter, and arranged a lovely plan. I just wasn't fit to go out, I'd been crying so; but I came down about ten o'clock to play such amusing games of cards with Monsieur Dupont!—games that Arabs play in Algeria. He and I've been together ever since; as snug as possible: and the minute the announcement was made in the Atrium, Senor Mendez ran out and 'phoned to Monsieur Dupont that I'd won the aeroplane. I expect he and Signor Maroni will be around soon, to wish me joy."

Dupont and I had exchanged bows. He had sprung up in an excess of politeness for a second: but now he sank back in his wicker chair, fingering a small black moustache and smiling to himself.

Wendela indicated a chair to my notice, and touched an open box of cigarettes on a small table. I sat down. But I did not smoke. I knew that a pair of handsome black eyes and a pair blue ones were fastened upon my face—as the saying is: though it might equally well refer to the activities of leeches.

"Pity you didn't win the tiara you wanted so much," I remarked. "An aeroplane's no good to you, of course, and—"

"So I suppose you'd advise me to give it away with a pound of tea?" giggled Wendela.

"Miss Smith gave you the winning ticket," I said dryly.

"Does she propose to turn Indian giver, and take it back again?" chirped Wendela.

"She proposes nothing of the sort," I answered the taunt. "What she proposes—or what I propose, is—"

"Wait a minute," Wendela cut me short. "I've already had one proposal tonight. Before you go on with yours, I'd better make you a little confession. I promised you not to tell anyone who Miss Smith really is, and I kept my word, honour bright I did! But this afternoon I was upset by all your sarcasms about Number 1717; and walking home with Monsieur Dupont he—he guessed."

It was all I could do to follow Napoleon's counsel and "keep my anger below my chin." But a lot might depend upon my doing so. I spoke quietly if bitterly. "How could he have guessed unless you gave him a lead?"

Yet alas, I too had given Monsieur Dupont a lead, and he was quick to take it. He sprang to the defence of the lady, in his Algerian French—rich and rough as some Algerian wines.

"Do not blame Mademoiselle!" he pleaded. "I suspected already. Those daily visits to the Flying School: the skill, which I had heard of—and there are few young women aeronauts of distinction in Europe. One can count them twice over on the fingers. We three who once formed a Syndicate, and were badly treated by Sacha Kapieha, put our heads together, as you English say. The little sister has changed, has grown up since the day when we met her one day just before the war. Still, once we thought of it we could trace a resemblance. We wondered, we took an interest. It needed only a match to break into flames. All Mademoiselle 'Orden did to-day was to strike the match."

"Speaking of her, I'm afraid I said—quite by accident—Miss Kap—and changed into 'Smith,'" explained Wendela, snug and safe under the wing of her champion.

"You constantly do that, in speaking to her—quite by accident," I retorted. "But I did hope such accidents wouldn't occur with strangers! Not that Miss Smith has any reason for hiding her identity, except a wish to not be conspicuous while her brother's name is on everybody's lips—"

"She was afraid people would know she was here after the aeroplane," broke in Wendela. "She was just like an ostrich burying her head in the sand, and expecting not to be seen. It would have been real dramatic if she'd won her brother's aeroplane, after letting the truth about herself come out. But as things are, the truth is a sort of anti-climax. Nobody'll care now whether she's plain Miss Smith or—plain Miss Kapieha."

"Plain she can never be under any name!" I couldn't resist.

"That's a matter of opinion," said Wendela. "I think she's positively hideous—a little wizened, green-grey eyed thing, with no more figure than a walking stick! But her looks are of no importance. Neither is she. We were talking of the aeroplane, which I have won."

"With her ticket!"

"Don't let's hark back to that. She thrust it on me, out of sheer spite! Didn't you realise I read her motive? Serves her right that I've won her brother's machine—so there! If she hopes I'll give it to her—"

"I told you, she hopes nothing of the kind. What's done, is done. I don't want to accuse you of—lacking generosity—"

"I wouldn't do that if I were you! It would not sound well from you to me."

(That everlasting room and the eternal eiderdown were always sticking in my throat!)

"I don't accuse you of anything," I went on more mildly. "Of course, you don't need to tell me that Monsieur Dupont and his friends have made you an offer for the machine. That goes without saying. You wouldn't—couldn't sell to them, when you know poor Kapieha willed the Mascot to his sister! And—by jove, if I were superstitious, I should say his spirit put the winning number for it in her hand! Tell me what these gentlemen's offer is, and I—"

"But Monsieur, Mademoiselle 'Orden has promised us the machine!" cried Dupont, who understood English, though he didn't trust himself to speak it.

Wendela's slow, moving gaze travelled to Dupont's face and seemed to note its sudden flush, the hawk-like spark in the eyes which could be so softly "glad" for pretty girls and heiresses. I understood with a gleam of hope that the man had given himself away in that greedy outburst.

Without speaking, Miss Horden turned to me, and studied my face also. I couldn't read hers; but under its rather silly softness I caught a hint of something keen, the gift of Henry S. Horden to his daughter. It was like a glint of steel seen through fluffy ruffles. I tried to pour worlds of pathos into my eyes as they met hers. I tried to grovel with them for everything I've ever done which she didn't like. I tried to suggest that everything she did like, would be done in future; all orders promptly carried out by Hers Truly.

"Good egg!" I thought, when her expression gradually melted, like hard sugar in the sun.

"I didn't go so far as to promise, Monsieur Dupont," she temporized. "What I said was, that I might let you have the aeroplane."

All the Arab blood in Amedeo Dupont flamed behind his burning eyes. I saw him wishing with might and main that he would have Wendela far off in a distant harem. Not because he loved her. Oh no! But because he would love to see her sewn up in a sack or punished in some other old-fashioned, thorough-paced method which Arabs once used with re-fractory ladies.

"Mademoiselle, 'will' was your word, not 'might,' and I hold you to it," he said fiercely attempting to master her with his strong magnetism of the male animal over the female. He must often have succeeded with his trick, for he was remarkably handsome and the very effort he made was flattery to a lump of a girl like Wendela. But this time it didn't work. Miss Horden looked mulish.

Serve them all day long

Puffed Rice and Puffed Wheat, in the food way, are summer's supreme delights. Millions of children get them now, morning, noon and night—in a dozen enticing forms. The first dish in mornings, the last dish at night. Do you realize how these whole-grain dainties have changed summer's food regime?

Flimsy, flavory bubbles

They make whole grains enticing—the foods that children need. Each grain is an airy globule. The texture is like snowflakes, the flavor is like nuts. So children count them food confections, and they never get enough.

Every food cell blasted

Made by Prof. Anderson's process. Over 125 million steam explosions are caused in every kernel. Every food cell is blasted, so digestion is made easy and complete. Every granule feeds. Thus one gets the whole-grain nutriment. And that in wheat means 16 needed elements.

What is the matter with your hair?

Falling?

Dandruff?

Oily?

Dull?

All largely due to a single cause Make this free test—A way to correct it

This is to men and women who wish to care for their hair in a more scientific way. To keep or restore its beauty, its health, by methods right and modern.

There is now an ideal method. It deals effectively with the cause of hair troubles, present or impending. It embodies the best that men know.

THERE is an oil in the scalp called Sebum, secreted by the glands of the hair. It lubricates the hair—gives it lustre and softness. It keeps the scalp flexible, or should. It is the hair's chief friend.

But, like all skin secretions, there is often an excess. Then the hair becomes too oily. The surplus Sebum decomposes on the scalp. It forms fatty acids which inflame the scalp.

Scales and dandruff often follow. The scalp outlets are choked, the oil is suppressed. Dryness and scale may kill the hair roots, so the hair falls out. Then Sebum becomes the hair's great foe—the cause of most hair troubles.

Cleanliness the first essential

The first rule is the same as with any skin surface. Remove the excess, cleanse the pores. Think what would happen to any skin if you failed for a time to do that.

But you must aim at Sebum—that particular scalp oil. Dissolve it, remove it, then get into the pores. Not with ordinary soaps or shampoos, but with studied, tested, scientific methods.

Our experts have embodied in Palmolive Shampoo the best ways known to do that. It combats the Sebum—Sebum only—correctly and efficiently.

That is the first essential. Don't rely on guesswork, on ignorance, on non-scientific means. Your hair is too important.

Beauty—softness—luster—health

The next thing is to treat your scalp as you would your cheeks. Apply a soap based on palm and olive oils. Do what millions do with Palmolive Soap to foster fine complexions.

Palmolive Shampoo does that. It is based on the oil blend which for ages has held supreme place for the skin. The purpose is to give to the hair luster, softness, beauty. And to fit the scalp to maintain healthy hair roots.

Those are results which you want and need regularly. The other helps are told in our book.

A home demonstration—free

To show these effects we will send you a treatment to try. We will send you the oil blend and the Sebum combatant combined in Palmolive Shampoo. It will show you the ideal way to give your hair care, beauty and protection. You will know that in an hour.

With it we will send a book—"How to Take Care of the Hair." That will tell you just what to do for any wrong condition. For dry hair, for dull hair, for falling hair, for dandruff. The advice is up-to-date and authoritative. It will tell you how to deal with damage already done.

Think what your hair means to you. Let us show you how to beautify it, how to preserve or restore it. Send this coupon now.

Better than jewels —that schoolgirl complexion

The girl with a clear, smooth skin, radiant with freshness and natural color, should leave jewels to those less fortunate. The charm of a perfect natural complexion attracts far more than elaborate dress and ornaments.

If your complexion lacks the beauty which women envy and men admire, don't depend on clothes and jewelry to draw attention from its defects.

Every woman can transform her bad complexion into a good one, for alluring freshness and clear color isn't a gift of Nature, but a matter of care.

How to have a perfect skin

No girl need be afflicted with a bad complexion, for improvement is simple and easy. Daily cleansing, gentle but thorough, is the secret. You must use soap, for nothing else will remove the dirt, oil and perspiration which collects in the pores and causes most skin trouble.

Choose Palmolive, because its action is soothing. Harsh soap should never be used for washing the face.

Massage the smooth, creamy lather gently into the skin until it removes all clogging deposits. Don't forget your neck and throat. They are as conspicuous as the face for any lack in beauty.

Careful rinsing leaves the skin stimulated, freshened and free from the accumulation which enlarges the pores, causes blackheads and carries infection.

Blended from the same oils

Palmolive Soap is blended from the same bland, soothing oils which adorned the sumptuous marble baths of Egyptians, Greeks and Romans.

But although very expensive, the gigantic volume in which Palmolive is produced keeps the price very low. Users profit by Palmolive popularity. The Palmolive factories, working day and night, and the importation of the rare oils in vast quantities, allow you to enjoy this finest facial soap for the modest price of 10 cents—no more than ordinary soap.

EDITORIAL CHAT

MIDSUMMER magazines are supposed to be devoted to articles on cooling drinks and to light fiction:—the kind which is always described as "a good story to read in a hammock." The stories which are to be found in this month's issue are entertaining enough for either a summer afternoon or a winter evening. "The Bride's Cup" comes to us from British Columbia—some way, we nearly always have a story from the Pacific Province—"Aunt Min Takes a Hand" is from a Toronto writer and "Wanted—a Plain Stenographer!" has arrived from Winnipeg. The serial story is more enthralling than ever, for the "villains" have become quite active at Monte Carlo, and we wonder whether the hero is ever going to secure that aeroplane and find out where the precious pearls are hidden. The former motor stories by C. N. and A. M. Williamson are tame and uneventful in comparison with the diverse scenes and happenings in "The Idol of Youth." This serial, we think, will be concluded in August, and is one of the most attractive features we have had for many months. The illustrations by Mr. G. W. L. Bladen are in keeping with the romance which holds so much of dramatic variety.

In our April issue was an article signed "Mary Ann," on a subject of deep interest to the majority of Canadian households:—the matter of domestic service and its desirability. We have received several favorable comments on this contribution, and the following letter from an Ontario reader, signed "Old Bachelor," tells its own story:

"I have just finished reading an article in the April Journal by Mary Ann, entitled 'Why I like to be a domestic servant.'"

"Mary Ann is a girl after my own heart and her young man is to be congratulated. If we had more Mary Anns there would be fewer of us old bachelors and more of us staying on the land and contented with life as we were intended to live it."

The beautiful reproduction of "Sweethearts," by Soulacroix, which makes our July cover, is from a painting in possession of Mr. George H. Gooderham of Toronto. It is an exquisite depiction of an old-time garden, with the lovers which are for all time.

This is Canada's birthday month; and, in recognition of that fact, we are publishing "Miss Canada," an article by Mr. Charles W. Stokes of Montreal, which discusses the old question of whether there is a typical Canadian girl. You may not agree with the writer, but you will be interested in the article.

This delightful photographic study, "Hope Springs Eternal," is from the studio of Mrs. Minna Keene, F. R. P. S., of Oakville, Ontario

Real Naptha!
You can tell by the smell

Clean clothes and health are playmates

Sunshine may put the sparkle in the eye; fresh air, the roses in the cheeks; proper food and rest, the vigor in the limbs; but clean clothes are a health factor of hardly less importance. The real naptha in Fels-Naptha Soap loosens the dirt and body-oils on which germs feed and breed, and the snowy suds flush them away. Then the naptha vanishes, leaving the clothes clean, sweet, sanitary.

The Fels-Naptha "soap—soak—rinse" method (rubbing very soiled parts) simplifies the summer-clothes problem for all the family. You can wash even your lingerie and sheerest silk stockings more frequently, with perfect safety and less effort with Fels-Naptha.

Fels-Naptha is more than soap. It is more than soap and naptha. It is the exclusive Fels-Naptha blend of splendid soap and real naptha in a way that brings out the best in these two great cleaners. Get the genuine sanitary soap—Fels-Naptha. It holds the naptha until released by the wash-water for the attack on dirt! Directions printed inside the wrapper.

Campers write enthusiastically that Fels-Naptha washes greasy dishes and dish-cloths even in cold spring-water, and washes them clean. Any brook is a laundry with Fels-Naptha Soap.

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPTHA ODOR

"TAKE good care of him," Will's mother had said, as she bade them farewell at Liverpool. "Remember, he is not the man he was before those terrible weeks in Flanders. I have had to be patient, Ena dear, and you have some trying times ahead of you. Make allowances."

She had done so faithfully when dark moods came over him, and lately the doctor had pronounced him a new man. They had been ideally happy. There was so much that was new and strange to her and she would run to him a hundred times in the morning to ask him to explain this or that when he was busy with his fruit trees.

It was fun growing accustomed to her surroundings and household affairs, but when it came to the people it was another story. Will was so much one of them. She was convinced that everyone in the town eyed her critically, sometimes with a touch of contempt for her Old Country ways. They were very kind, but she could not help a feeling of inferiority while she was amongst them. Will said it was all imagination, that she was afraid of them and too stand-offish.

Her nearest neighbor, Polly Dade, often dropped in to see how she was getting on. She wished she would not always come at the wrong time; when she had neglected some bit of housework to try a new recipe as a surprise for Will; or, perhaps, she had left the dishes to finish up a bit of sewing. It was very provoking, the way she had stood on tip-toe and seen the dust on the shelf at the last Ladies' Aid Meeting.

"Say, Mrs. Gladson, what a shame to have all that lovely china out in the dust," she had remarked in a loud voice. "Isn't that cup cute?"

She looked up at the cup now. It was of a lustrous cream ground, all wreathed about with blue and yellow flowers and brown leaves. Behind it hung a framed and illuminated verse which ran thus:

"This cup is thine, fair bride of mine,
Use it through weal and woe.

Round it doth many a garland twine
With charm for friend or foe."

It had been handed down to successive Gladson brides. She remembered the day Will had brought it to her—a spring day, when she sat in the meadow at home, sewing for her home that was to be. Shafts of sunshine pierced through the swelling brown buds of the oaks to the green carpet interwoven with blue and yellow at her feet. To complete the joy singing in her heart came Will, carrying the cup.

"Take it, little girl," he said. "It will bring you luck. It has never been known to fail since the first Will Gladson had it made in the pottery for his own bride. Blue and yellow are my lucky colors," he added, touching her golden hair and blue eyes lightly with his lips.

Much luck it had brought her! Will and she were just drifting apart. There was no longer perfect confidence between them. He had much more in common with the Dades. The neighbors had hinted that before the war it was thought that he would marry Polly.

She resumed her cleaning, flicking the duster viciously round the parlor until she arrived at the window. Vexation and alarm clouded her pretty face as she looked in the direction of the Dade barn.

"What is Will doing there again?" She tried to remember how often she had seen him going in there the last few weeks, sometimes alone, sometimes with Joe Dade, but more often with Joe and Polly. She had asked Will repeatedly what the attraction was and he had just put her off with some reply not at all to the point. The first time he had colored furiously. Now pride kept her tongue still, but not her poor perplexed mind. She did feel so out of it. Will was hiding something from her.

Moving over to her work-table she picked up some sewing and examined it. Her expression changed to one of brooding tenderness. She held up a tiny white garment and lovingly fingered a dainty bonnet. She was so absorbed that she did not hear footsteps approaching. Will's tall form darkened the doorway.

"What, sewing again, little woman? And you have been tidying up, too. Of course, you are going to polish the bride's cup. It looks as though you hadn't taken much stock in it lately."

"There's nothing to that nonsense. And, anyway, I can't be forever dusting china. If only I had a proper place to keep it I believe I should think more of it."

"You will use it to-night, won't you? You did last year on your birthday. It is nice to keep up these old associations. It makes you feel one with those gone before. Why, it even does the husbands good, Ena. You don't know what I'm not prompted to do when I study it of an evening, dear. Oh, I was forgetting! Mrs. Dade meant to tell you when you were over not to go to much trouble about supper. She will bring some things with her."

"It's very good of her. I suppose she thinks I don't make much of a hand at cooking. Can't we have a good time on my birthday without the Dades?"

"Sure we can; but I want them for a special reason. You will understand later. Just trust me, dear."

"Very well; but I'd far rather be alone. I don't care for Polly Dade."

What did it mean? It was quite plain that he did not want her there.

She decided not to go out, but to have a rest. Perhaps it would put her in a better frame of mind. She must not look dismal at her birthday supper and especially must appearances be kept up before Mrs. Dade.

As she lay dozing upstairs there was a quick tap and the outer door opened again.

"Are you there Mrs. Gladson? Oh, you're resting! Don't come down. I have brought a few things for to-night's supper. You don't mind, do you? Will said he was sure they would come in handy. I made you a birthday cake which I hope you'll accept. Everyone says my cakes are real good."

As she reached up, her hand encountered an envelope.

"She has a good heart. You want to come out of your shell and get better acquainted with these people."

"I won't fail you, Will," she sighed, "but I do want you to myself."

"Aren't you tired, Ena? Why don't you knock off work and go out for a bit?"

"Come with me, Will," she pleaded.

"Impossible. I'm much too busy. I have a job I must finish."

"What is it? Let me come and watch you."

"Oh, it's an inside job and you should be in the fresh air. Do stop working and do your thinking outside. I have two good hours' work till supper time."

He stooped and kissed her on the forehead and closed the door behind him. She walked to the window just in time to see him speeding into Dade's barn again.

"Oh, thank you, I'm sure. You shouldn't have gone to so much trouble."

"You're welcome. We'll be over after a while, and, if you like, I'll help you set the table. Do give me a call if I can do anything."

Ena heard her hurrying down the garden path, singing as she went. Her heart burned within her at what she considered Polly's managing ways. She could not even run her own birthday supper.

SHE closed her eyes and, in the silence which followed, could see only the bride's cup. First as a thing of supreme beauty, which became gradually clouded until it was scarcely visible. As it vanished from her sight she became more and more unhappy. At last it disappeared altogether. She groped frantically round but it was gone and she was conscious that it had gone forever. In her despair she turned to Will and he, too, was nowhere to be found.

She woke with a start. Had she been dreaming? Were Will and the cup really gone? She hurried downstairs, rubbing her eyes. To her relief the cup was there, but somehow the dust reproached her now. For the first time her attitude towards Will and those amongst whom her lot was cast, gave her little twinges of conscience. She had been ungracious to her husband, suspicious of them all. Still, it was not right to keep things from her. The clock struck five. In another hour they would be in to supper.

Going upstairs, she put on the blue frock Will liked best and coiled her hair in the way he loved most. With a snowy table-cloth on her arm, she went down and set to work on the table. She undid Polly's cake. It was a masterpiece, layer upon layer, and beautifully iced. A box of candles beside it provided a gentle hint that she need not yet object to its being properly furnished. The magnificence of this one quite put her own in the shade and she made up her mind to use it when they were alone. Indeed, she preferred to do so. Everything was tastefully tied up in blue and yellow paper, and she wondered if Will had mentioned his pet colors. Even that could not be a sacred thing between them.

She opened the window to air the room, and gay laughter attracted her attention outside. Joe Dade and Will were carrying something large and carefully covered up, from the barn to the house. Polly followed behind, and they were all making merry over it. A wave of anger swept over her. Turning round, the bride's cup caught her eye again. She fought down her annoyance, and prepared a place of honor on the table for the cup—the final touch before the feast.

As she reached up, her hand encountered an envelope. She threw it carelessly down and hastened to wash the cup before her guests should arrive. What mysterious spell did it possess? The table assumed a radiance almost spring-like, and she felt happier. Picking up the envelope she read:

"To my dear wife, with the best of birthday wishes."

She drew out the contents. A little roll of bills lay in her hand—Will's present to her, and she had inwardly chafed because he had not given her some remembrance!

It was just like him to hide it where she would find it during the day. He dearly loved a mystery. The last few months she had condemned him in her heart. She needed extra money for sewing material and had to go without. Will had lent the Dades money to help pay the taxes on their place. They had returned it, and now here it was all showered on her. It was as if a veil fell from her eyes and her warped imagination finally righted itself. An impulse sent her rushing to the door to find him and confess. It was growing dark, but she fled down the path.

"Will! Will! Where are you?" she called.

"Coming, dear! Why, what is the matter?" She caught her foot on a projecting stone and fell before he could save her. After that, Will, her birthday, the Dades—everything was a blank except the pain in her head.

Some weeks later, Polly Dade sat by Ena's bedside, rocking to and fro and looking admiringly down at a wee bundle in her arms.

"Isn't he a beauty, Polly? I do love his cradle, and the china cabinet, too. It will keep my treasures safe when this greatest treasure of all gets his hands into mischief later on. You have been so good and I don't deserve it."

"Will was always fond of planning surprises for people. I guess the cradle and the china cabinet were two big ones for you. Joe is a handy carpenter and took such pleasure out of helping Will because he has been a true friend to him in time of need. It was too bad you had that fall just as we were coming over to your place with the things."

"Yes; if I had not been such a silly, it would not have happened. I let the dust collect on the bride's cup and my happiness. It won't get a chance again."

THE IDOL of YOUTH

CNE-AM WILLIAMSON

Illustrated by G. W. L. Bladen

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.

Captain Malet, a young officer returned from the war, is at Bournemouth with his Aunt Sarah when the beauty and distress of a young foreign guest at the hotel win his interest. In the guise of a waiter he makes her acquaintance, persuades an American millionaire, Henry S. Horden, to give him some caviare for the starving girl, and, before the evening is over, saves her from suicide and makes a friend of her dog, Petro. The girl is Patchinka Kapieha, a sister of the heroic aviator, Sacha Kapieha, who had lost his life in the war and whose plane is even then being offered as second prize in the lottery at Monte Carlo. Patchinka is taken to Mr. Horden, who had known her brother and who had wished to buy the aviator's secrets of invention. He adopts Patchinka as his niece and suggests that they should all go to Monte Carlo to buy the plane. In the meantime, Captain Malet is sent to buy a wardrobe for Miss Kapieha (known as Miss P. Smith) and is having difficulty explaining his needs to the saleswoman, "Miss Forty."

The latter (who is Miss Victoria Wellington) helps him effectively and becomes chaperon to Patchinka on the Monte Carlo expedition. They arrive and discover that three members of a syndicate, Mendez, Dupont and Maroni, are planning to secure the plane. Mr. Horden's wife (Dutch by birth) has been living at The Hague, but the daughter, Wendela, arrives at Monte Carlo, unknown to her father. The woman whom Sacha had loved, the Marquesa di Fiumine, who is unhappily married, is at Villa Persane near Monte Carlo. Wendela introduces a complication, becoming attached to the reluctant hero.

Patchinka manages to reach the poor Marquesa, who is in the power of Dr. Silvestro, who tries to represent her as insane. She tells of a wonderful "essence" which Sacha had hidden and which might give the secret of the plane. Captain Malet learns to fly, although his instructor, Gauthier, dislikes him as a rival. The lottery comes off. Patchinka had made a present of the ticket, 1717, to Wendela, and, by a wonderful coincidence, this ticket wins the plane. Dupont then insists that Wendela had promised to sell the plane to him.

"You can't hold me to it," she defied him. "Even if I said 'will' (which I didn't.) You've nothing in writing."

"Mademoiselle," cried Dupont. But quickly he saw his mistake. Dutch-American blood is not a combination for a French Algerian to browbeat. It must be humoured, coaxed, petted, forgiven, even in moments of supreme crisis. "Mademoiselle, I trusted you," he reproached her, a starry look as of tears behind his thick lashes. "I trusted you for myself and my friends. In a few moments they will be here, and—"

"Well, I haven't made up my mind yet, one way or the other," Wendela said stolidly. "I'd better make it up, though, before they come. Monsieur Dupont, if you don't object, I'll step aside for a few seconds with Captain Malet for a little private conversation!"

Dupont flushed again. (He must, I thought, have the very devil of a temper!) "But, Mademoiselle, I do object!" he urged. "The Captain is my rival. He wants Kapieha's aeroplane. It is promised to me. I can't allow him to talk you over, behind my back."

"He isn't going to talk me over," maintained Wendela, her heavy chin square. "The principal thing I want to say to him in private has got nothing to do with the aeroplane directly; and if you try to keep me from saying it, I—I—well, none of you shall have the old thing!"

Dupont rose instantly and bowed, his flush faded to an olive paleness. He looked homesick! "I will not stand in your way, Mademoiselle," he rejoined. "But I consider that you have firmly promised. And the word of Monsieur 'Orden's daughter is as good as her bond."

Wendela and I walked to the end of the hall furthest from our little group of basket chairs.

"I just hate people trying to bulldoze me, whether it's you or Dupont or anyone else," the girl pouted. "You've often been horrid to me, Boy, and this afternoon was the limit—yes, the limit and down the other side. You said the hatefulest things! But I guess I'm pretty weak where you're concerned. I have been from the first! I'm like that when I care for anyone. Man or woman. I'm real forgiving. But I do draw the line somewhere. I won't go on making big sacrifices for a boy that puts another girl in front of me every single time. I know as well as if you'd told me, that if I threw those men over for you, no sooner would you get the aeroplane for yourself, than you'd give it to her—the little green-eyed cat!"

"If you mean Miss Kapieha by 'green-eyed cat,' I promise not to give her the aeroplane," I said.

"You will? Oh, but don't I know you? You're beating the devil around the bush. You wouldn't give; you'd sell—for thirty cents. Or some old trick like that."

"I swear I wouldn't. I'd give you my word of honour not to dispose of the machine at all—except with your consent and approval."

She looked at me with her head on one side like a big, white Persian kitten.

"Humph!" she muttered. "I wonder if you're stalling?"

"I don't know the verb to 'stall' except in an aeroplane language," said I. "But I'm willing to take my bible oath not to do whatever it is."

Wendela giggled slightly—and nervously. "That's not enough. I want a lot more out of you than a Bible oath not to trick. I want at least two more Bible oaths before I do any business at all."

"What are they?" I asked.

"One is, that I shall have a say about the passengers you take, anyhow in the first flight you make from here. What about that, to begin with?"

I thought hard for a second; but a second was enough. I remembered that Patchinka would not be a "Passenger" in any flight I was likely to make.

"All right. That goes," I cheerfully agreed, "provided the passengers pay; and you don't interfere with my choice of a pilot. The passengers you may select as if they were frocks, so long as they pay well. I'm not out to fly for my health, you know, my dear girl. I tell you frankly I've been banking on this railway strike. I'm not quite qualified for a pilot's job yet; but with a smart pilot I can do all the rest; and I ought to earn a pot of money with a big machine like Kapieha's fitted up (as it can be roughly, in a few days) to accommodate several passengers."

"Well, I'm to have the right to be one of them if I want to," the girl bargained. "Bible oath on that, please!"

I reflected again. Most likely she wouldn't want to, when the time came. It was fairly safe to promise. And it was extremely unsafe not to promise.

"That goes too," I consented.

"Bible oath?"

"Yes. Is that all? If it is—"

"It isn't. There's one more condition."

"That makes three, you spoke of two."

"At least two. The one I'm coming to is the most important of all."

"Out with it, then!"

"I will. I'm as anxious as you are to settle this business. When I go back to Dupont the others will have come, and I must give them an answer once for all. What that answer is to be, depends on yours to me."

"You make me curious."

"That's better than furious! Before I promise even to let you touch my aeroplane, you've got to promise me this: that you'll never, never ask that Kapieha girl to marry you—"

"Ah, I thought so! Now I've hit you where you live!"

CHAPTER XXIX.

What Wendela Decided.

SHE had indeed! She had "hit me where I lived!"

To promise—for such a promise I could not break—was like walking into a dark cell, a prisoner for life. It was like murdering my own youth. And that I should be asked to make such a promise to-night of all other nights, was an irony of fate.

The wonderful look given me purposely by Patchinka (yes, I felt it had been purposely given, for me to understand) had offered definite hope.

The more I thought of it—and I have thought of it every instant since we'd stood together on the Casino steps—the more I realized its beauty and its meaning. It had been all feminine, and had told me as by a flash of lightning in the dark, that of late Patchinka's ways of boyish camaraderie must have been more or less a pose. She must have come to care, in those days of our flights together, or there would have been no such love looking out from those dear eyes of mystery.

Perhaps, if I'd funk'd on that first day with Gauthier, and found nothing in myself akin to joy in sky adventures, my Lady from the Air might never have loved me as a woman loves a man. But she did love me—if only a little—in that way, and knew that she could love me more. She had meant me to know it, too! And now, to win what I must win if I were to be her worthy knight, the thing I had to do was—to give her up.

Yes, it was all contained in that; and searching for some way out, I found myself wandering round and round a vicious circle.

Patchinka's voice had begged me to get back Sacha's aeroplane. I had earned nothing, deserved nothing. If I did get it, I put myself out of court to get anything beyond.

If I accepted Wendela Horden's terms, I might again see that magic look in Patchinka's eyes. But I could take no advantage of it. I mustn't seem to read what it said. Because it would be impossible to put in bald words the sacrifice I'd made to give my Lady from the Air her Wish. I couldn't say, "I believe you like me, and I know I love you; but I've promised Miss Horden that I won't propose."

"All right, this finishes you with me! You won't give up that hateful girl who'd make you miserable if you married her," Wendela shrieked. "All I wanted, was to save you in spite of yourself. That's my only reason for making such a—a request. It's got nothing to do with me! Except that we've been friends, and I'd like to think I'd rescued you from—from an adventuress. I'll go back now to my other friends, who're men of the world, and see that creature as she really is. I'll tell them they can have—"

"Stop!" I commanded. "I haven't refused your request. I was only thinking what a strange one it is. Miss Kapieha wouldn't have me if I did propose, so I'm not losing much in giving my 'Bible oath' that I won't. Does that please you?"

Her pale eyes tried to read the depth of me. "Do you give 'Bible oath'?" she repeated. "Do you swear by all you hold sacred that you'll never, never propose to Miss Kapieha, never ask her to marry you?"

"If I swear that, will you swear to sell me Sacha's biplane for a reasonable sum to be agreed upon between us?" I edged.

To my surprise, Wendela rapped out "No!"

I was bowled over. "You've been playing with me, then?"

"I have not!"

"In that case, I don't understand you."

"Come back with me to Dupont and the others," she ordered. "I'll explain to you there."

"I thought you brought me into this corner on purpose to settle everything between our two selves, with no one listening."

"That's so. But we've gone as far as we can go now."

Giving me no time to protest, the girl walked sharply away from me towards the front of the hall, where Dupont had been joined by Mendez and Maroni. I had seen the Spaniard and the Italian enter some few minutes ago, and out of the corner of my eye had become aware of their feverish interest in our confab. Maroni had wished to interrupt it; but Dupont (already guilty of one mistake with Wendela) and Mendez (more diplomatic or more wary) held the Italian back almost by force.

Wendela tripped back almost towards the waiting group with an air of supreme self importance visible even in the back view of her shoulders. There was nothing for me to do, except follow her, and I did so, my feet seeming to be weighted with lead. Once, early in the war, I had been slightly "gassed." I felt now somehow as I'd felt then.

Mendez and Maroni had doubtless realised before this the influence which Dupont's superior charm and comparative youth gave him over the young woman. They had come to Monte Carlo, I firmly believed, each with the intention of playing a lone hand, and nothing could have been less welcome to any member of the late Syndicate than the sight of his fellow member on the spot—"crows gathered where the body was," as Patchinka had put it. But, circumstances having changed kaleidoscopically, the three had seen that union was strength; in fact, that they must pull together or fall. They were at one now; and Mendez and Maroni stood aside for Dupont to be spokesman.

"I hope, dear Mademoiselle," he addressed her in a voice of pathos, "that you are not going to throw us over—we are your friends."

"I'm not going to throw anyone over!" Wendela announced. "I'm going to do the right thing by you all. But—on second thoughts I can't sell the aeroplane."

"What? Can't sell—" gasped Dupont. I was past gasping.

"Can't sell. Can't give. You see, I remembered in time about my father. You've all heard of him. Captain Malet's met him. Well, I had a letter from dad the other day, with a cheque in it. The letter'd been following me round for awhile and nearly lost itself. I was so pleased with the cheque at the time, I didn't think much about Dad's news. But I recollect now; he said he was in Europe to do a big deal buying up aeroplanes for our country. Probably he'll want to buy this one when he knows I've won it. He'd be real mad at me if I went and sold it to someone else. Besides, I guess he can afford to pay me oodles and oodles more than any of you folks can."

"My friends and I offer you here and now six thousand of your American dollars—two thousand for each of us. It is a good price for an old machine like Kapieha's," urged Dupont. "There have been improvements since—"

"But I first told you I wouldn't sell," broke in Miss Horden. "It wouldn't be fair to Captain Malet, even if it would to Dad. What I will do, is this: till Father needs it, I'll—I'll lend the biplane."

"To us!" Dupont caught her up. "We thank you, Mademoiselle. With this strike coming on, we—"

"So you're thinking of the strike too?" giggled Wendela. "Everyone seems to be thinking about the strike. But you don't know how to fly, do you?—not any three of you!"

"We shall not attempt to fly the machine ourselves. We shall hire a couple of professionals. We—." They were now all three talking together; but Wendela cut them short, and almost drove their breath down their throats.

"You won't have to do that. I've promised to lend the machine to Captain Malet, who was my friend before I met you. But I made this condition with him; that I should choose the passengers for his first flight—paying passengers, of course. Well, I choose you three gentlemen. And you can settle terms among yourselves!"

CHAPTER XXX.

Wendela on her rights.

I MIGHT have known that Patchinka would bear the blow well.

She had had black moments when she blamed herself, believing that she had thrown away her brother's Mascot, with the fortune—meant for her—which it might conceal. Having gone through the worst, however, Sacha's sister bore the news of Miss Horden's decision like a soldier.

She even laughed a little, with half-amused bitterness, when she heard Wendela's condition; that she, Patchinka, must not be a passenger in the prize aeroplane.

"She might have been sharper, and bargained that I mustn't fly at all," the girl said. "But she's a strange combination, this Wendela Horden: sometimes keen as a knife, like her father: sometimes fluffy as wool. What I lose, is the pleasure of owning my Sacha's machine. But always there were thousands of chances against my winning! What you lose, will be the money for selling to Mr. Horden if you had won—"

"I wouldn't have sold. I'd have given it to you, to do as you pleased with. You ought to know that," I reproached her, as we spun towards Cap Martin, with the Iron Duke fast asleep in the taxi.

"Well, it's better not to dwell on 'might have beens'!" sighed Patchinka. "Miss Horden has some of her father's blood in her veins, so she'll stick to the agreement he made with you, let's hope. We haven't gained the best thing. But we've got the second best: more than we had any right to expect—though we did somehow expect it all, didn't we? The Mascot seemed to belong to us. Our wish so strong! Still, as it is, we shall find chances to look for the hiding-place, and we shall find the papers if not the pearls. They will be mine in spite of everything, and I shall take them for my own."

"Not if Mendez, Dupont and Maroni can help it," was the thought in my mind. But I didn't put it into words. Patchinka had worried too much already about "danger" for me, when these men should learn our errand at Monte Carlo. Now that, after a fashion we had gained our ends despite the odds against us with which we'd started out, the girl would worry a good deal more, I feared, once her mind was switched back to the Syndicate.

The Lady from the Air had a way, however, of seeing into one's brain, and at the same time (without slyness) preventing even her nearest friends from getting a peep into hers.

"Of course," she said, "those men will fight us for all they're worth. A little will let me come into the house, or let you stop outside, for a second. And there's the question of where to put the biplane when it leaves the Place. Wendela's sure to shove all the work on to me, and if I kick, the Syndicate will grab the job. Besides this strike is sure to come off now—may stop every train on the P.L.M. tomorrow, and the rest inside a week. I must get your advice about rigging up a cabin. And then there's the question of petrol."

"Yes, there's the question of petrol!" the girl, echoed, letting her question slide.

"If people engage us for long flights while the strike is on, you must make certain of having plenty—plenty! There must be some of course to buy in Nice. But how long will it last? Borisoff may help—but Gauthier won't. And the prices will mount up, up, as soon as the strike begins. If only I can get to Laurette again, and find out her secret."

"Don't forget my inspiration. We'll try that," I reminded the girl, and she caught me up gaily. No further catechism about those "conditions!" But I wasn't soft enough to be deceived, as I might have been once, before I knew Patchinka well enough to know how little I did know her. I was sure she had read and suspected my hesitation.

her points. In other words, she'd got pretty well what she'd wanted from me, and was likely to stick to it. I depended upon that.

After a bad night, I slept later than usual next morning, but hurried over my dressing to make up for lost time, and expecting to be down before Wendela. I was struggling with a sullen tie, however, when the upstairs waiter tapped at my door with a note from Miss Horden.

"Aren't you ever coming down, dear Bad Boy?" it asked. "Monsieur Dupont has been here breakfasting with Senor Mendez, advising me where to keep MY aeroplane. I've practically decided what to do, but don't want to make definite arrangements without seeing you. Oh Boy, I'm glad we're friends again, and that you're sorry for being horrid, and aren't going to turn the cold shoulder on me for the sake of a Certain Person, after this. I'm just tickled to death I've won the biplane! I always prayed I would, though I lay low and Brer Rabbitted to you. I thought you'd bring me more luck without knowing—because ignorance is bliss every time, isn't it? Yours—Wendi. P.S. I'm writing in the restaurant."

I hardly waited to wade through the stuff. Giving a final jerk to the tie, which Maroni was greatly excited by the patchwork story told by the doctor from Turin.

while ago I used to be afraid of them, when they were working in the dark. But now it is light. We know what they will try to do, and when. It will be during a flight they will ask you to take them on. And you can't refuse, because of the promise you had to give Wendela; that she may choose the passengers. We shall be prepared, you and I, Duguesclin! They will be three to two—and one of those two a girl—for I think Sacha's Mascot can't well be fitted up to take more than five people altogether. I've been studying the machine, and what to do with her, whenever I have looked at her in the Place. Still, somehow I am not terrified as I used to be—not even for you. I know you better than I did. And I see how you always win through everything."

"I haven't won through this business to-night as I hoped—as I almost vowed I would do!" I sighed.

"But, you have done wonders, considering what Wendela is. Surely, to get what you did from her, you must have had to accept more conditions, others you haven't told me of?"

"One or two. Nothing to speak of." (I meant this literally; they were not to speak of.)

"None—concerning me?"

"None you'd be—interested in."

"Let me judge!"

"We've so much to settle to-night, and we're almost at the Cap," I reminded her. "I don't suppose the Iron Duke

She'd ceased to press for an answer, not because I'd lured her into forgetting, but because she wouldn't embarrass me by persisting.

When we bade each other good-bye at the door of the Pension, however, the crude electric light in the hall showed me a face different, somehow, from the tragic one illumined whitely in the Place du Casino.

There was no longer any passion or promise in the eyes. They were mysterious as always; perhaps more mysterious (for me) than I had ever seen them. If I hadn't known that it couldn't possibly be there (nothing had happened to bring it there!) I should have imagined a gleam of mischief under the long lashes.

I had insisted on Wendela Horden's signature to a few lines scrawled by myself at the British Hotel. Perhaps I should not have thought of this if she hadn't squirmed out of a "near-promise" made to Dupont with the excuse "You've nothing in writing."

Well, I had now something in writing. I had Wendela's word in black and white, to lend me Sacha Kapieha's aeroplane for as many trips as I wished to take during a period of not less than two months: the agreement to be renewed or dissolved by mutual consent after that time. I was not even greatly afraid that Miss Horden would wish to throw me over. I'd agreed to all her conditions! She seemed to think them of importance, and to feel a sense of triumph in having gained nearly choked me I pelted downstairs two steps at a time.

There she was, at the breakfast table, with the ruins of four oranges on her plate! (Wendela was a hearty eater) and her likeness to that accursed doll I'd won was so abominable that I felt it becoming an obsession.

Mendez' table, next Miss Horden's, was unoccupied, though littered with the remains of food for two. I guessed that the two men, having scored in some way, had preferred not to face me and cleared out.

Wendela held an 'Eclairer de Nice' in her hand, and appeared actually to have been reading it. As a rule she boasted that she never bothered with newspapers, and her only reading so far as I'd ever seen, consisted of fiction, the more sentimental the better.

"It's in the 'Eclairer'" she joyfully announced: "About the winning numbers in the lottery, I mean: so everyone knows now, Monsieur Dupont brought me the paper. I'm as happy as a lark. I hope you are."

"There are larks and larks," said I. "Larks in the sky; and larks in a pie. But you sent for me to talk about the biplane. She'll have to be moved somewhere today, you know, or tomorrow at latest. I thought Borisoff at Nice would let us put her in one of his hangars perhaps, and—"

"Oh, I was sure you'd think of him. So were Mendez and Dupont. But I didn't want to keep the machine there. It's nix on that, my boy."

"Why?"

"Frankly, because Borisoff's such an idiot about Miss Kapieha. I don't trust her, so I won't trust him. Do you see?"

"No, I can't say I do."

"None so blind as those who won't see! Miss Kapieha's mad at me because I've won her brother's biplane which she was wild to get herself. I wouldn't put it past her to do the thing some damage out of spite against me. Oh, you needn't look as if you'd like to squash my nose with your egg-spoon! You can't make me think any different from what I do. I don't change my mind as often as you change your collar! I've promised to lend you the machine for flights. I owe it to those poor disappointed dears to let them do something. They offered to try and hire a hangar down by the port, where they say a seaplane used to be kept. I said they could. And we'll have guards watching the thing day and night to make sure no mischief is done."

I saw by Wendela's lip (which seemed to unfurl an extra length of obstinacy) that it would be futile to argue—futile as trying to turn a pack mule into a race-horse. "Righto!" I answered so cheerily that she jumped. "It's all one to me where you stable the plane so long as I'm free to bring carpenter chaps to look her over and arrange how to fit her up with everything as a liner de luxe."

Wendela replied dubiously that she wouldn't object to carpenters if they were carpenters. The machine must be made comfortable in order to earn its salt. But, of course, she was the owner. Plans must be made and approved by her before any work was done. Mendez and Dupont and Maroni (she broke the handles off their names behind their backs) all knew a lot about aeroplanes, and would give her independent (strong emphasis on that word!) independent advice!

"You don't mind my calling them in as experts do you, Boy?" she asked. "You're not that yourself yet—an expert, I mean?"

"Oh, I don't mind even if Mendez and Company offer to guard the machine," I said, "because I shall be guarding it too: day and night. The plane is yours. I'm responsible for it to you. And I won't be caught napping. When I go off duty, it will be to leave an understudy of my own choosing to protect your property!"

"I won't have Miss Kapieha understudying and protecting!" Wendela snapped.

I smiled a superior smile. "Miss Kapieha has better things to do." She had. But I was not bound to say what.

CHAPTER XXXI.

When the Strike Began.

THERE was something else in the "Eclairer" almost as important to me as the winning numbers, and more important to the public: the news that the threatened railway strike had begun.

When I went out for a last look at the Mascot dominating the Palace Du Casino, I found Monte Carlo seething with excitement over the news.

We'd been concentrating so tensely on the Lottery that we hadn't noticed how people with other ideas in their heads had disappeared during the last few critical days. No matter how many leave Monte Carlo, there are always crowds remaining. And no face except Patchinka's being essential to me, I'd been unaware that many vaguely familiar faces had vanished.

There had been, it seemed, a great exodus yesterday. And after the news which Patchinka and I had seen posted in the Atrium, there was a rush for trains; trains of any sort: quick trains, slow trains, trains going anywhere.

This morning early I was told the last train had steamed out of Monte Carlo station packed like boxes of sardines; or even more tightly packed than that, for sardines never sit on top or hang on behind their boxes.

Now motor cars were being engaged at enormous prices. American millionaires, English politicians, Spanish grandees, stage beauties, and all sorts of people who must be at home on a certain date, were willing to pay through the nose. Soon the supply of automobiles, private and public, would be exhausted at the rate they were being snapped up; and then, if not before, the harvest would begin for aeroplanes.

Of these there were few on the Riviera, as I had already taken pains to find out. Borisoff and Gauthier had several, all old, none fitted for passengers; but theirs were war-relics; and any bombing machine has space which can be utilised for other loads than bombs. I thought it likely that the partners would do what I schemed to do, and I imagined that by this time they had men working to transform their biplane.

I'd had visions of a jaunt to Nice for Patchinka and myself; had planned to get a couple of mechanics, run the Mascot down to the hangar near Monaco's port—where there was, of course, room to take off a flight; and then, with Patchinka as pilot, had hoped to fly to Borisoff's. There I'd intended to keep the machine, and engage some clever carpenter of Nice (whom Borisoff could recommend) to rig up a cabin.

This scheme was now knocked on the head, one blow dealt by Wendela, another by the premature commencement of the strike. Borisoff and Gauthier would already have annexed the best men at Nice; and as the Mascot must remain in for the present at Monaco, I saw myself obliged to find carpenters and cabinet makers in the principality.

The worst of it was, I could depend on no one to help or give me disinterested advice. I was on friendly terms with my landlord and his son; but Mendez was an old client of the hotel; the proprietors would think of him before they thought of me. And, though the Syndicate had stipulated with Wendela to be my first paying passengers, I was pretty sure they would cling to Monte if possible rather than go anywhere at all. If they could prevent me from taking the machine away, and at the same time secretly work their will upon his, I believe they would do so.

I phoned to the Pension Rossi, and told Patchinka about the latest move: Wendela's decision to house the Mascot at Monaco. I said that I'd been forced to agree, as the machine was hers; but Mendez, Dupont and Maroni were not to have things all their own way. Two sides could play at their game. They might guard the biplane in her hangar from me; at the same time I should be guarding her from them.

"Which means," I added, "that neither we nor they can explore for the hiding place till after we've started for—heaven knows where! But then we will get our chance—somehow. Trust me for that."

Patchinka answered that she did trust me. Her voice sounded bright and brave, brighter and braver, I thought, than if she guessed that never could I hold her to that sweet, silent promise of last night. She must have known that I would read the language of her eyes. She must, despite her boyish ways, have seen all along how it was with me—that I loved her, not as a 'pal,' but as a man loves the One Girl. And she was bound before long to wonder why, after that look she'd given, I never claimed its promise. Evidently, however, she hadn't begun to wonder yet.

Sacha's Mascot was safe from any designs of the Syndicate while she still adorned the Place du Casino; and on enquiry I found that she might remain if necessary until late afternoon. Before lighting-up time the Administration would be glad to have the place clear.

There were two hangars down by the port, and though Wendela didn't know it, a baby seaplane still brooded in one of them; a lame and dwarfish duck which the owner (who had bought her second or third hand) wished to sell. Even now, when almost any machine you could get away in was worth—for the moment—a fabulous sum, there were as yet no competitors for this neglected bird. She had had two severe accidents, and though she'd been neatly patched up, had never lived down her bad reputation. At best the creature had never been capable of long, sustained flight, and was at present hopelessly out of date. She was suitable enough, however, for a certain purpose I'd conceived; and finding the owner unwilling to let (it was easy to guess why!) after a short trial flight I bought this baby plane (hatched in 1913) for three thousand francs. No doubt the man went home and danced for joy; but I could have done the same.

Having engaged the second hangar for the Mascot, I hurried here and there in search of a skilled carpenter. At last I ran one to earth, in a side street of the Condamine, that closely built, low-lying stretch between Monte Carlo and the towering rock. To him I described in words and hasty pencil sketches what I wanted done: promised high pay, and having roused the plump Monegasque's cupidity and ambition, took him up to the Place du Casino for a look at the biplane.

Wendela, Mendez and Dupont were together, wedged into a garden seat, staring at Miss Horden's prize, and no doubt discussing my plans regarding it. They bowed to me; and the men's eyes, had they been cormorants, would certainly have devoured my fat companion. The three men whispered excitedly and presently joined us, while Wendela guarded the bench from intruders.

"Monsieur Viale," I explained, "is a skilled carpenter, or perhaps I should call him a cabinet maker. I've told him what I want, and that I want it soon. He thinks he can rig up a light little, right little cabin for at least three passengers; three ply wood and plenty of window glass, you know. As he begins to-day, he engages himself to finish by the end of the week."

"These people of the South are free with their promises," Maroni answered rudely in French, looking less Italian and more German than ever. "The proverbial pie-crust is less easily broken."

"Monsieur!" protested Viale, reddening; "I am not a liar. This gentleman offers me a good price for the work. I can afford to put plenty of men on it. They will agree to work overtime, and besides, I have the window glass and framework already in my workshop. It can easily be utilised; otherwise I should not have dared contract to finish so soon."

"Well, we shall see," said Maroni. "I will believe when my eyes bear you witness."

"One would say that Monsieur does not wish the work to be done on time!" puffed Viale.

"That would be odd," said I, "as he's to be one of my first passengers. By the way, gentlemen, I haven't heard yet where you want to go. Though there's time later to discuss that—"

The three gazed at me stonily. "Each of us has his own destination," replied Mendez. "I have to return to Spain, Dupont to Algeria, Maroni—"

"Maroni hopes he is not a coward, but he values his neck too much to trust it to an amateur," put in the Turinese. "Rather than that, I will remain on terra firma and pray for you all in the air."

"May your prayers save us!" I smiled. "Who is your pilot?" Mendez catechised.

"Depend on it I shall have a skilled one," I evaded him. "You needn't worry. But we're not here to talk about the pilots or future flights. Monsieur Viale's time is money—my money! He wants to get back to examine the materials he has on hand."

Whereupon I switched my attention on to Viale himself, who was, I could see, furiously eager to show this doubting Thomas what a Monegasque could do at a pinch.

Sacha Kapieha's Mascot was a large bombing machine with a 550 horse-power six cylinder Rolls Royce engine, and was able (Patchinka had calculated) to carry about twelve hundred pounds at a speed of one-hundred-and-forty miles an hour. The inventor had aimed both at stability such as had been an unknown combination in one machine before his day. His Mascot was the first aeroplane made to be self-steadying in its longitudinal pose, while possessing steadiness of lateral pose in the fullest degree.

Patchinka had pointed out to me the marvellous power of her brother's biplane to go straight through a gust without either diving or rearing. She was proud of the smart gyroscopic control, and had explained to me how, when one wing would tilt up or down relatively to the other, Sacha's gyroscopes had power enough automatically to right it.

The cambered planes were narrow and longish, yet small enough for speed; and the top plane being pushed slightly forward so as to give the pilot a clear view ahead, the machine got what I'd learned to call a 'positive stagger.' All the Mascot's special features were finely creditable, considering her early type; and one which I highly approved was the power of quick lift off the ground when ready for flight. As for her "ceiling" (extreme height she could reach) Patchinka had boasted that it was far above the 'ceiling' of any biplane prior to Kapieha's.

Altogether, the more one studied her 'points' the more tragic did it seem that the prize had not been won by Sacha's sister. Still, it was useless to repine over spilled lottery tickets, and the only thing to do was to make the best of a very bad bargain.

Viale owned a younger brother who'd been in the French Air Force during the war; and through that brother had made acquaintance with many pre-war airmen who in peaceful seasons had thrilled the Riviera by their stunts. Viale senior had done a little work of these men in the brave days when flying was all for fun; therefore he readily absorbed my ideas, and even involved useful new ones of his own. Perhaps I had to thank Maroni that the Monegasque was thoroughly on his mettle now. He would not fail me if he and his men had to work eighteen hours out of each twenty-four!

CHAPTER XXXII.

Understudies.

MONTE Carlo is the home of home of excitements: but never had the gay town been in such a ferment (said old inhabitants) as during this post-war railway strike.

No doubt it was much the same all over the Riviera, except at places so quiet that, once arrived you stayed and went to sleep. But my experiences confined themselves to Monaco and its neighborhood.

Even when Viale's workmen were tinkering at the Mascot, I did not feel she was safe from the Syndicate. A chance touch and the secret hiding-place Patchinka believed in might be revealed! That mustn't happen in my absence and the Trio's presence, unless the ideal understudy could be found. Patchinka, of course, would have filled the bill; but Wendela was firm in her taboo of Miss Kapieha, even though I drummed into her head that real danger menaced her property. I could think of no one to trust, and would have fed and slept in the hangar if on the second day of my ordeal the Iron Duke had not proposed herself for the part of understudy.

At first, the idea seemed laughable. It was such a far cry from a Bournemouth draper's to the hangar of an aeroplane near the port of Monaco! But this quiet little lady had come from Cap Martin in a crowded tram, with Patchinka's consent, and had found her way down to the hangar, burning with the zeal of a martyr; I had to hear her arguments.

"Why not?" she asked. "I could give you five or six hours off, quite well. Or more. I've thought it all out. It would be much like watching an invalid, in the absence of the nurse, and—you needn't laugh, Captain Malet! I can be here by day from nine in the morning till one. I must say I should prefer those hours to afternoon, as I shouldn't quite feel it right, missing my tea. There's something almost sacred about tea. I always think. Then again I could arrive at, say seven, and remain till ten-thirty. It wouldn't be in the least improper till eleven. I do feel it might be what the French call risque, even at my age, after that. But I thought you might manage to snatch a certain amount of food and sleep at these odd times, while the strain lasts. Also, you could be free to run over to Patricia at Cap Martin if she specially needs you—as she expects she may do soon. I know I was engaged as her chaperon. Still, the circumstances are exceptional. And Patricia is an exceptional girl."

"She is," I agreed, "and you're an exceptional woman. But you're not a basilisk; and if those men should be up to mischief, you could hardly quell them with your eye."

"Perhaps not," she admitted, "but Petro could."

"Oh!" I said. "I'd forgotten Petro as a factor in the situation. You propose that Petro should share your vigils?"

"Patricia proposed it," The Iron Duke explained. "I confess, I thought that if I came over with a camp stool and sat with my knitting (I'm at work on a jumper for Patricia) it would be quite simple. But she pointed out that with such people as we have to deal with, one must be prepared for the unexpected. Petro is a preparation against the unexpected. A dog who barked at the German guns is equal—"

"By jove, yes!" I exclaimed. "And superior. Well, I take off my hat to you every time, Iron Duke. I see now that you and your knitting (Madame Defarge knitted!) plus Petro, and perhaps Viale's son to stand by you, would be invincible. If you think that Pat—Miss Kapiha may need me—"

"She said you'd understand," explained Miss Wellington. "Even if Miss Horden weren't so vexatious. Patricia wouldn't be coming over to Monte Carlo at present. She's keeping her eyes and ears open in the direction of the Villa Persane, and she hopes that any evening now, she may be able to 'phone 'Come.' The way I put it doesn't sound—er—quite comme il faut, I'm afraid. (I hope I pronounce the of the hangar. With him was one of two tame detectives from Nice who had been recognized and identified by Viale for my benefit. One of the Syndicate was always on the spot doing watch for himself and his fellow members, as I did it for Patchinka. But as the three distrusted each other, sentry duty was always shared by one of the detective pair, who took the business in turn. Mendez pretended to ignore my visits, (whom he knew well by sight) and stared at Viale's busy band of workmen swarming round the plane. We—the Iron Duke and I—were just inside the wide-open doors, so far from my rival watching that even if he were a first-class lip-reader he could catch no word of our conversation.

"Will you tell me what Miss Kapiha has now got hold of from the Villa Persane?" I went on.

"Oh yes, she asked me to tell you everything. I shall bring you news whenever I come, and take yours to her to feed his dog—an unpleasant creature which is allowed to mumble bones on the dining-room carpet."

"What time does Silvestro dine?" I cut in, with a quick thought.

"I was going to tell you: rather late for this country; a quarter to eight, and he doesn't move from the table till nine: he has his coffee and cigarettes and liquors there;" (she pronounced it 'likoors') "and at the same time the Marquesa's own maid takes a dinner tray to her mistress's bedroom. Lately, the Doctor insists on the Marquesa being in bed to dine—to rest her nerves, he says. You remember that the poor lady's clothes were always taken away by the maid. Well, now it's even worse! This young footman, whose name is Guiseppe, makes himself agreeable to the woman, who is flattered because he's young and she isn't. She has told him that her mistress went out of doors one day in dressing-gown and slippers, to hear some wandering music-being here to free you from seven to eleven every night will be helpful."

"It will!" I assented, hastily arranging in my mind instructions and wages for Viale's son, a local athlete who won prizes from other Monegasques for wrestling and boxing. This youth—in whom his father had great pride—toiled not, neither did he spin. He was supposed to be training as a professional; and mentally I had already hired him to protect my understudies, human and canine. Alone, I would not trust him to guard our interests against the Trio, but as guardian of Petro and the Iron Duke he would do. It was only when my brain had pigeon-holed Viale's fil, that it rebounded to the Marquesa di Fiumine.

"But—if she has nothing to put on!" I reflected aloud.

The Iron Duke blushed, and looked as prim as she looked in Bournemouth when I selected Patchinka's wardrobe.

"She will have something. Dear Patricia is planning. A bundle will be given to Guiseppe, and he'll smuggle it into the Marquesa's room. Just when he'll be able to do this, he can't tell; but he thinks he can manage it best about six-thirty, which is the time when the maid has undressed the Marquesa. She goes then to her own room, to hide the things she's taken off the poor young creature. While she's there, Guiseppe will slip in with the bundle of clothes, whisper 'From Miss Kapiha. Hide this till dinner time,' and slip out again. The Marquesa won't be frightened, because he has helped the maid carry dishes in, once or twice, and she knows him by sight. As soon as the bundle's disposed of, Guiseppe will light a candle in the top room of the tower where no one ever goes, and there never is a light. He won't dare leave it long. But Patricia intends walking along the road, back and forth, past the villa each evening at six-thirty. If she sees the signal she'll run home to the Pension and 'phone to you—at some place near the hangar where there is a telephone, and you can get a message. She wants me to ask. What about Viale's shop? Is there a telephone there?"

"No," I answered, "but there is at the Restaurant Suisse, next door to Viale's place. I can arrange to have a message sent the moment it comes, and brought me here at the hangar."

"Yes, that's what Patricia hoped you would do. Just these words: 'pension says, Come.' You'll understand, and no one overhearing would suspect. I'll reach here promptly at seven, so you'll be free to do—what you've planned to do. I don't venture to put it in words, with the Dreadful Man about the place, even though he's too far off to hear what we're saying. He makes me quite nervous, pretending that he doesn't see me; and all the time feeling as I do that he's got eyes in the back of his head. You know, even Patricia—who's so brave—worries about him and the other two. And there's a new danger now—at least she thinks so. It seems that Doctor Silvestro has got bored at the Villa Persane, waiting for the Marquesa to die, or go quite mad and be packed off to an asylum. He's supposed to send her a draught for nervousness, to drink about nine o'clock every night. The servants believe he drugs her, instead, to make her sleep soundly, so he can be safe in leaving the house. A carriage comes for him at 10.30 and he drives to Monte Carlo, where he goes to the Sporting Club and comes back to the villa often as late as two o'clock. Guiseppe knows this for a fact. He has a friend who is a waiter at the Sports Club. Well, Patricia puts two and two together. The Doctor is supposed to be a man of Turin, and that horrid Italian of the Syndicate is from there, too. Suppose they're acquainted? Suppose they meet these nights at the Club, and talk over things? If the doctor has ever heard the Marquesa speak of the essence—the petrol—she stored, think what might happen! He'd probably give Maroni permission to search, and—"

"I'll do my best to keep Maroni busy over here," said I. "They take turns you know, and relieve each other every three hours, reinforced by a detective—"

"Ah, but what a lot of mischief might be done in three hours!" moaned Miss Wellington. "I would put nothing past Maroni, myself."

This gave me furiously to think. Everything sensational seemed to be happening at once, in these few days! But the Iron Patchinka stepped through the tradesman's gate.

French right?). But we were saying, Patricia is exceptional. And you're acting together in a noble cause.

"You too!" I praised her. "You're in the game with us for all it's worth."

"I should like to be!" she sighed, blushing like a girl. "I'm so anxious to earn this wonderful adventure I'm having—the only one I've ever had or am likely to have, in my life. Till now I could do nothing except enjoy myself, and say 'Oh don't, my dear!' to Patricia occasionally. But here is a way open to me, and I don't know how I should have borne it if you'd refused my services. Patricia would have been disappointed too, for she's working hard to get at the Marquesa for your own sake, as well as the poor lady's. She's going on splendidly and is very hopeful. The moonlight would be so useful, too! But of course, if you're tied here to the aeroplane every hour of the day and night, all she can accomplish may go for nothing."

"Thanks to you, it won't do that," I said. "You're going to free me from Bondage." And I glanced at the figure of Mendez, seated on a stool at the far end when I go back. You know what a peculiar fascination Patricia has when she chooses to exert it? Something almost mysterious! Well, she has used it over the Rossi family. There's nothing that man and woman wouldn't do for her. She hasn't taken them into the secret, of course, but she has excited them over the idea that the Marquesa—the dead father's kind patroness—is being badly treated. They're ready to do what they can to help, even at a risk to themselves from interfering. To please Patchinka they've made friends with a new young Italian footman at the Villa Persane. Rossi takes him to the Cinema at Mentone, and stands him drinks. Also the boy comes to the Pension, and it's easy to make him talk, though he's in terror of the Doctor. It seems that he—Doctor Silvestro, I mean—rules the household, but he has his weaknesses, and the servants know how to get round him. He's lazy, and likes lying in bed late. He's greedy, and sits long over his dinner, drinking a good deal of wine and reading French novels. He likes only tales of murder or worse, and is so absorbed in them that he forgets ians, and since then she isn't allowed even to have those—er—garments. She's supposed to ring for her maid and ask, if she wants them. The maid has been moved into a room adjoining, which used to be the Marquesa's when he and his wife were friends. Since that day of the Musicians, the maid sleeps there, and at night, the door is left open between."

"All that looks bad for us," I said. "It does—look so. Once the maid's in her room for the night nothing much could be done, Patchinka thinks. The best time is when the Marquesa is having dinner. The maid takes in first one course, then another, and stops in the kitchen so long gossiping with the chef, that often fifteen or twenty minutes go by after the poor lady has had one dish, before she gets another. Not that she cares. Apparently she eats no more than enough to keep a bird alive. The servants think she doesn't want to live—and they're sure her husband doesn't intend her to! But what I was going to say, is this; while the doctor's guzzling his dinner, and the maid's in the kitchen, that's the time to try your plans. So you see, my

I AM sorry, but I am afraid you could not fill the position. We must have an experienced stenographer." For the sixth time in as many days Marjorie Chester heard those exact words. It seemed to her now that when she applied for a position and stated she had had no experience she was sounding the death knell to her own hopes, until she wondered if the stenographers she saw in offices had been born with "experience." That word poor Marjorie was beginning to hate more each day.

"If they would only give me a chance," she said to herself as she trudged home to her boarding-house. "I know I could make good"—but she had almost given up hope of ever getting that chance.

Upon the death of her father six months previously Marjorie had been thrown upon her own resources. There had been very little money left—in fact, financial worries had hastened his death, and she found herself facing either self-support or dependence upon her relatives. This latter Marjorie refused, although her cousin, Mrs. Dale, had begged her to make her home with them. She had taken the few hundred dollars left to her and gone to Meltonville to equip herself for a position in the business world. The weary months of struggle with the curls and kinks of shorthand, coupled with the lonely life at the boarding house, had not been easy for Marjorie. Her courage, and happy sense of humor had saved the day for her many times and brought her to a point where she had graduated from the business college as a full-fledged stenographer anxious to take her place in the ranks of shorthand writers. She had not foreseen how hard a task this would be, and now after a month of searching Marjorie was almost ready to accept Mrs. Dale's latest invitation to "leave shorthand alone for a while, and come to our cottage for the summer."

When she reached her room she sank wearily on her bed, so discouraged that she began to let herself think how nice it would be at the Dale's summer cottage. Her independent nature would not let her give up, and she did not let her thoughts run on in this strain for long.

"I wonder what's the matter with me," she said to herself. "They say I am too young, and that old fat man laughed today when I told him I was twenty-three. He didn't seem to believe me." She got up and crossed the room to her mirror. "I wonder if it's this short mop that deceives them." She ran her fingers through her short wavy hair, making it stand on end, Zulu fashion, and she laughed at the effect.

Marjorie was short and very slim, and standing there laughing at herself in the mirror she did not look more than sixteen. She was beautiful in a dark gypsy sort of way. Her hair was jet black and soft as finest silk. Her features were not perfect, but the gallant soul of the girl seemed to shine from the depths of her dark eyes. The red lips seemed ever ready to part in a laugh, giving to her face a vivacity that arrested the attention of even the most casual observer. It was only when discouraged or sad that the shadow of her recent troubles lay across her face, dimming the glow in the soft brown eyes.

She turned to the paper lying on her bed, and once more studied the "Female Help Wanted" column.

"I suppose they will all state 'no beginners need apply,' as usual" and indeed of the half-dozen positions advertised they all contained that clause, except the last on the list, and Marjorie read it through twice, wondering, then threw back her head and laughed.

"Why not?" she said, and sitting with the paper crumpled on her lap and rocking with laughter she had, as she afterwards said her "brain wave."

"Why not?" she repeated, and she straightened the paper out again "It says never a word about 'experience' but just 'Wanted a stenographer. Must be plain and elderly. Apply in person—204 Avenue Block.'"

"I'll do it, I'll do it" she whispered to herself, "I'll go to that sale on Bond Street and get the old-fashioned dress I can find. I'll buy a wig if I have enough money, and wear my dark glasses."

She threw the paper down and whirled about the room in a sort of a war dance, then she snatched up her hat, "If I can only do it for two weeks even, I could say I had had some experience, and then maybe when I had proved to the old skinflint that I could take dictation I'll apply for the job all over again" she said to her image in the glass as she powdered her pretty nose before rushing out to buy the "old fashionedest" dress, convinced that the man who had advertised for an old and plain stenographer must certainly be a skinflint and extremely old.

Had she seen him at that moment she might not have started so gaily on her errand. John Kent was not old, nor did he look like a skinflint, but he certainly did look cross, as he savagely corrected the letters just turned in by his present stenographer, Flossie Musgrove. Flossie was young, her head was full of the things Clarence had said to her last night and of the good time she was going to have at the dance that night. While Kent was thus engaged, his friend Dave Jackson sauntered into the office. Dave was that languid type of Englishman who always sauntered. He was never known to be in a hurry.

"Why the gloom, old man?" was his nonchalant greeting.

For answer Kent handed him one of Flossie's letters. "Read that" he said. Jackson read the letter through, "I'll admit," he said, chuckling "her ignorance of the English language is appalling, and her spelling leaves a lot to be desired; but even that shouldn't force you to advertise for an old and plain one."

"So you've seen it" growled Kent.

"Couldn't miss it. Had any applicants yet?"

"No" said Kent "I suppose they all hate to admit they are old or ugly. 'If I could get a stenographer who could write a decent letter, I wouldn't care if she were as old as my grandmother and as ugly as sin.'"

At this Jackson laughed uproariously, "Speak for yourself, old man; but give me youth and beauty every time."

"Get out," said Kent savagely, and Jackson went.

As he passed through the outer office Flossie was renewing the scenic effect on her face, and Jackson felt that after all he did not blame Kent for wishing to dispense with youth and beauty—real or otherwise—in his stenographer.

Meanwhile Marjorie was making herself over in order to answer Kent's advertisement. The dress she had bought was certainly anything but fashionable, and was rather large, especially around the high collar; but that was "all to the good" she told herself as she poked her short hair up under the grey wig. The effect was rather startling to Marjorie as she looked into the mirror, and although she realized that the grey hair did not match her merry brown eyes, or softly rounded chin, she tried to assure herself that with the addition of the dark glasses she looked indeed "plain and elderly."

She donned a straight sailor hat and, heavy veil, and when she presented herself at Kent's office, he was so pleased to see her that he did not look at her very closely. Here was an applicant for the position at last. One who was not afraid to confess that she was old and plain; but he did hope that she wouldn't have false teeth. Marjorie's smile reassured him, and he found himself wondering how a woman with grey hair could have retained the firm chin and the soft, dusky coloring of a girl. However, he did not give himself up to these reflections for long, for as soon as he found she could take his dictation and read back her notes with perfect ease, she ceased to be anything to him but a perfect stenographer.

It was arranged that she should start the next day, and Marjorie left, feeling that she had passed the first test at least, and that she would have no difficulty in keeping up the subterfuge, "if only the old wig will stay on straight, and I can slip in and out of the house without anyone noticing me in this awful rig-out."

EVERYTHING went along smoothly for a time. The work at Kent's office was not difficult, and as he did not look at her very closely Marjorie felt that he thought the grey wig was genuine, and that she would be able to keep the farce up for a week or two at least, when she might be able to get a position where youth was not objected to. But the weather began to get warm, and Marjorie felt uncomfortable in the black dress with its high collar and long sleeves. She did not dare wear something lighter in case the change would cause Kent to inspect her more closely. The wig made her head ache, and twice Kent had all but caught her with her glasses off.

It was a very tired girl who came home from work some three weeks after she had started at Kent's office, but a letter from her cousin made her forget her tiredness and the sun shone brightly in Marjorie's sky.

Dear little cousin: (Mrs. Dale wrote) As next Monday is a holiday won't you please spend the week-end with us? The change will do you good, even though you do tell me you have obtained "a perfectly grand" position. I won't take "no" this time, Marjorie, and Jim will call for you on Saturday afternoon about four o'clock. Bring your prettiest frock. A friend of Jim's who bears the reputation of being a woman hater will be here. Do come and help entertain him.

Heaps of love,

Winnifred Dale.

Marjorie tore off her black dress, donned a summery voile and ran down to dinner in a more cheerful frame of mind than she had been for some time. The prospect of two glorious days at Dale's cottage, free from wigs, dark glasses and dictation was indeed something to look forward to.

The next two days flew by on wings. Just before closing time on Saturday, Dave Jackson dropped in to offer Kent his congratulations upon having secured the stenographer he sought.

"Where did you get it, Kent?" Marjorie heard him ask.

"I'll admit she's rather ancient; but she's a pippin of a stenographer." Upon hearing this, it was all poor Marjorie could do to keep from tearing off the wig and glasses and showing them that she was neither old nor ugly; but she contented herself with sticking out her tongue at the half-closed door, and the thought that if she was a "pippin of a stenographer" as Kent had said, she would soon be able to get another position and leave "Skinflint" to hunt up another "old and plain one."

She left the office feeling more glad than ever that she was going to the Dale's cottage for the week-end.

"Even if Jim's friend is a woman-hater, he can't be any worse than Skinflint Kent," she told herself.

Poor Kent did not deserve the name she had fastened on to him. He paid her a generous salary, and although he very rarely talked to her, he had been most courteous in his treatment of her; but all the same Marjorie longed for a chance to show him that even a girl of twenty-three could be an efficient stenographer.

The twenty-mile drive to the beach with jolly Jim Dale was pure delight for Marjorie. She worshipped the outdoors with the worship of one who has been brought up close to the heart of nature, and Mrs. Dale's welcoming embrace at their journey's end brought home to Marjorie how much she was starved for love. As her cousin fussed over her she had a hard time assuring her that she had a lovely position with a lovely employer, and she loved her work and had a lovely boarding house.

Dinner on the wide verandah was a companionable affair, with Jim Dale telling Marjorie that she had grown prettier than ever, and tenderly teasing his wife, saying that he had a good mind to make love to her cousin. The other guest was to motor from the City that evening and would probably not arrive till late.

"I can see Jack's finish when he sees you in that red rag, Marjorie" said Jim "He'll forget his role as woman hater."

"Have I your permission to vamp him, Cousin Jim?" she sparkled back at him.

"Permission! He'll want to eat you up the minute he sees you."

"Hm hm" said Marjorie. "Cannibal as well as woman hater, eh?" and Jim's big laugh rang out.

The happiness of being with people she loved and who loved her, brought back to Marjorie's face the gaiety that had been lacking during the last few weeks of unconscious strain. Her brown eyes sparkled with mischief and the little dimple kept coming and going at the corner of her sweet mouth. Her organdie dress of the popular tomato red shade brought out her gypsy coloring to perfection. The heat that was such a trial to most bobbed heads only made Marjorie's hair curl up the tighter, and as Jim had said she looked "good enough to eat."

The woman hater was not to see Marjorie in her "red rag" that night, however. She begged to be allowed to retire early, and she and Mrs. Dale were having a cosy kimono chat in her room when they heard the sound of a car drive up and Jim's big voice raised in hearty welcome.

Marjorie was awake before anyone was astir next morning. She felt like a happy child out on a holiday as she got into her bathing suit, and was soon running down the path toward the lake.

"Goody, Goody," she said, as she leaned forward with her hands between her knees and looked at the water as though it was an old friend. She had been splashing around in the water some time when she decided she would swim out to the float, then make for the house and breakfast. It was a longer swim than she thought, and she climbed aboard with difficulty and rested looking out across the lake. She was thinking of how delightful was the prospect of two such days of glorious bliss and did not hear someone else swimming up. She felt the float tilt and whirled around on one hip expecting to see Jim Dale, but she was not prepared to see Jack Kent, her employer, spring out of the water on to the float. The shock of seeing him almost sent her backwards into the water and left her speechless, staring at him open mouthed. She rose slowly to her feet, and Kent seeing her evident terror felt that he ought to apologize.

"I beg your pardon," he said; "I did not know there was anyone here."

"There isn't," said Marjorie as she dived into the water. Of that swim back to shore Marjorie remembered nothing, and as she walked up the path to the house she kept asking herself over and over, "Did he know me? Did he know me?" until her head felt in a muddle.

"I suppose he is staying at the hotel" she told herself as she dressed for breakfast, "and I had better wear something youthful, so he won't recognize me as his ancient steno."

In her straight white linen dress Marjorie did not look more than sixteen as she ran lightly down the stairs. She was about to step out on to the verandah when a familiar voice brought her to a sudden halt and the look of terror that had come into her eyes when she saw Jack Kent spring on to the float came back again, and as she backed up against the wall she realized that not only was her employer spending the week-end at the very same summer resort; but he was her fellow guest in the very same house. As the full realization of the fact came to her she turned and fled.

In her room once more Marjorie looked anxiously into the mirror almost in tears now, for if Kent found out who she was she felt she would certainly lose her position. Her sense of humor came to her rescue, and as the funny side of the situation dawned upon her she sat down and laughed. It was a composed Marjorie who, ten minutes later, came down stairs in response to Mr. Dale's call that breakfast was waiting and he was starving. She bravely faced the introduction to Kent, but as a look of recognition lit up his face, her heart jumped to her mouth, but her anxiety was short lived.

"Why, I do believe this is the water nymph I frightened off the raft a little while ago" exclaimed Kent, and Marjorie laughed gaily, so great was her relief.

"Water nymph" asked Jim Dale curiously. "Marjorie, did you go swimming with this fellow this morning?"

"She did not" was Kent's instant denial. "She swam away from me, and looked so frightened when I boarded the float

They were resting after the game when Kent asked Marjorie quite frankly: "How old are you, Miss Marjorie?"

that she almost fell off. Am I forgiven, Miss Marjorie?"

His usual quiet face was alight with the friendliest amusement, and the thought that the old "skinflint" was rather handsome when he smiled crossed Marjorie's mind as she answered "Quite forgiven." But it was the "Miss Marjorie" that made her heart leap with gladness, for she knew that he did not associate her with his office or the grey wig when he addressed her in that way.

That afternoon, Marjorie and Kent swam out to the float together, and as they sat there Marjorie could not help thinking that considering the fact that he was a woman hater and wanted only a plain and elderly stenographer, he was certainly doing his best to be interesting to her. The funny side of the situation kept Marjorie in a very good humor, with her laughter ever ready to bubble over. She had taken off her bathing cap to let the wind blow through her hair, and to Kent she seemed the very embodiment of youth as she sat there in the sunshine.

"I hope you don't mind me calling you 'Miss Marjorie' "said Kent. "You see my stenographer's name is Miss Chester, and I cannot seem to associate you both with the same name. She is a very old maid." Marjorie laughed merrily at this, although poor Kent did not seem to think his remark had been so very funny.

Later in the afternoon, when Jim Dale tried to engage Kent in a political discussion he was annoyed at his guest's inattention, but as Marjorie appeared, and Kent excused himself on the ground that he was taking Miss Marjorie for a drive, Jim whistled softly to himself, and as the two swung down the path together he chuckled loudly.

"How the mighty have fallen. Didn't I tell you he would eat her up?" he asked his wife.

Mrs. Dale was watching the young couple starting off in Kent's roadster.

"Oh, Jim," she said, "If he only has fallen." I mean, if they both have fallen! For Marjorie is very independent, but it would mean an end to working in that office as she insists on doing."

* * *

THE two they were discussing were spinning along the lake shore road. Kent was telling Marjorie of a camping trip he was going on very shortly. Marjorie knew the country well where he was going, for her father had taught her the joys of the open trail, and at her understanding of it all Kent felt that this little girl would be a good pal to have along on any expedition. There was none of the artifice about Marjorie that he had so deplored in women. She took off her "tam," and the wind blew her short hair against his sleeve, and Jack Kent, to his own astonishment, felt himself keeping his hand rigid on the wheel lest he move his arm and brush off her hair. There was something very companionable about the nearness of this little slip of womanhood that warmed Jack's heart. His sudden silence made Marjorie look at him, and the brightness of her sunny face made him draw in his breath sharply. He straightened up and cursed himself for a fool. She was only a child. What could he have been thinking of—how could a happy-faced child start him thinking of what a pal would mean on his trip?

Kent was very quiet for the rest of the drive, and it was when they were nearly home that he said,

"I believe I'll have to go back to-night." Marjorie was frankly disappointed. "Oh, but you promised to play tennis in the morning."

"I did too," he said as he brought his car to a standstill in front of the cottage.

"But I am afraid you will have to excuse me." As he noticed Marjorie's evident disappointment his heart gave a great pound and he knew that the sooner he got away from this little girl who could be such a good pal the better it would be for that organ.

"Cousin Jim," said Marjorie, as they came up on to the verandah, "do talk to this man. He says he has to go back to town to-night. I say he can't because he promised he would play tennis with me in the morning."

"I'll say he can't either," said Mr. Dale. "He promised to come here for the week-end and here he'll stay." Marjorie left them with Jim discoursing on the impoliteness of guests who wanted to run back to town before their visit was over.

As Marjorie dressed for dinner she remembered Jim's words of the evening before, and decided on the red dress.

"I must make him stay," she said between her teeth. "He is the most wonderful man I have ever met outside of his office, and day after tomorrow I'll have to go back to my wig and glasses. How shall I ever do it?" She almost wept from sheer self-pity.

The "red rag" proved successful, for when Jack Kent caught sight of her he threw discretion to the winds, and he told himself then in spite of his thirty years he would spend one more day in the sunshine of this gay little girl's society.

He found it hard to keep his eyes off her during dinner, and Jim's chuckles were almost continuous throughout the meal.

They swam to the raft again in the morning and after breakfast Marjorie put up a good fight in a game of singles. Kent was out of practice, and Marjorie won the first sett 6-3, but as Kent got warmed up, and Marjorie got a little tired, she lost the next two setts, each by one game. She had put up a good fight. There was no willy-nilly about this little girl, thought Kent, and the phrase that had come oftenest to his mind the last two days, "Oh Lord, what a pal she'd make." They were resting after the game when Kent asked Marjorie quite frankly,

"How old are you, Miss Marjorie?"

Marjorie was very much amused, for she knew by some of his previous remarks that he thought her quite young, but she only replied,

"That is a very rude question to ask."

"I suppose so, little lady," he said as he gently took the brown fingers that were restlessly playing with the tennis racquet in his, "but you'll pardon an old bachelor for wishing you had been born ten years before you were."

Marjorie quickly withdrew her hand, jumped to her feet and suggested that they have one more sett. The situation had been saved, but the question that was ringing in Marjorie's head was, "How can I ever take his dictation after that?"

Kent begged to be allowed to take Marjorie back to town that afternoon, but in this she was firm. Jim had brought her out and he would take her back next morning. On hearing Marjorie's promise to Mrs. Dale that she would be back for the next week-end, Kent promptly invited himself, much to Jim's amusement.

Jim rallied her all the way to town the next morning on what he called her conquest of the woman-hater. When he left her at her boarding house, Marjorie had to make great haste to change to her old-maid attire. It took her some time and Kent was at the office before her.

She answered his ring with a quaking heart. "Will he know me?" she asked herself as she had done two days ago.

I WATCHED Cora as she patted a curl into place, and fixed a chic little grey turban at a becoming angle.

She was charmingly pretty, small and fair; at first sight, just a baby doll. But her big blue eyes held nothing of that infantile stare affected by the younger set nowadays; they were keen as rapier points although they could be very soft and luminous on occasion.

"I suppose," I ventured, "Arnold is going to drive this afternoon!"

Cora wheeled round from the looking-glass; hat stabber poised. "Aunt Min!" she exclaimed in a tone of exostulation, "Don't you remember that Arnold was shell-shocked?"

Naturally, I remembered. Would any thinking person wilfully ignore what those gallant boys suffered?

"What of it, my dear?" I answered.

My tone must have sounded apologetic, for the snap died out of Cora's eyes.

"You know, Aunt Min," she said, "The nerves are always affected, more or less, from shell-shock. And it takes some nerve, I can tell you, to drive an automobile along the Highway. I don't know, of course, how it would be with a flivver."

Her pretty lips took the curve of contempt just as though she had been a Russian Grand Duchess in the days of the old regime speaking of a serf.

I admired my god-daughter's smart Super-Six, but I had also enjoyed trips in cars of less magnitude.

"Gordon gets some good results from his Ford," I remarked casually, thinking of a young man chum of my nephew Hugh.

"Any old thing satisfies a beginner," said Cora loftily, "I did a good deal of driving when Overseas, and am still of the opinion that cheap articles are dear at any price."

Unconsciously, she stroked a fold of the expensively embroidered little crepe de Chine frock beneath her motor cloak.

"So you are going to drive, dear! And Arnold sit beside you!" "Nothing doing!" and she laughed, "You and he will sit behind. Yes Sir! I am not nervous, but a fussy man at my elbow might make me lose my head in an emergency. One has to be careful."

I am not a nervous woman as elderly spinsters are supposed to be; nevertheless, my mind was not easy over Cora's skill as a driver of a powerful automobile. You see, I had known her from babyhood; her mother and I had been close friends, and when Emmeline died I kept up my friendship with Dr. Logan and his only child. Now that I had come to reside in Toronto, I saw a good deal of them.

I knew Cora to be one of the sweetest girls, but—there! I am not going to criticise her.

It was early June, and the roads were in splendid condition. A week ago, my nephew Hugh's wife had come to see me with a thrilling bit of news. Arnold and Cora—two months married—had purchased a car to occupy the brand-new garage adjoining their brand-new bungalow.

"And it's a beauty," said Lucia, not without a faint tone of envy. I think she wished that Hugh was making as good an income as this young Englishman who had come to Toronto as representative of a big English firm with ramifications East and West.

Now, I was going out in the new purchase, having been invited for this particular Saturday afternoon. Cora was fixing up her toilet while we waited for Arnold to return from downtown. He was already half an hour late.

However, just as we were talking, he arrived; a slim young man of thirty, well-groomed, clear-eyed but a trifle too serious for his years. I like to see gaiety in the young.

"I am sorry I'm late," he said, as he put an embracing arm around his little wife, "The fact is, I ran across Gordon, and have been trying out his new car. You girls ready!"

Cora made a little grimace; not, I hasten to explain, at his bracketing the rosebud and the sere leaf in one generic term. There was nothing small-minded about Cora.

"Car, dear! Oh!" and as Arnold laughed heartily, "You had a lesson in driving!

Aunt Min Takes a Hand

But you know the mechanism of a Ford is quite different from—"

I guess so. Well, I'll be ready in a jiffy.

And he rushed off to change from regulation town garb into easy tweeds, leaving Cora frowning a little.

"Mr. Gordon is a nice fellow, of course a regular old bachelor"—she began.

"I'm not so sure," I interpolated.

Cora turned quickly.

"You don't say—"

"Since May Harriman has gone in for professional singing," I answered, "He seldom misses a concert. I have it on good authority. And we onlookers, my dear—"

"How thrilling!" cried Cora.

But she was not really overly interested. May and she were mere acquaintances, and she considered Gordon prosy.

Arnold came back, then; and we went out to the garage.

"What a ripping afternoon!" he said, as he climbed up behind the steering wheel.

Now, if Cora had been other than Cora, she would have accepted the situation. But Cora, like most tiny women of my observation, had possessed determination in inverse ratio to her size.

"Dearest, I am going to drive," she almost cooed.

Arnold made a grimace. It was not altogether an amused grimace.

"Are you? Don't be too sure, Cora," he said.

"But I really am, Arnold. You do not understand this car in the least," she said with a slight toss of the head.

"Is that so?"

His tone was perfectly polite, but ironical. And he frowned a little as he got down from the driving seat.

Cora, delighted at having achieved her ends, did not notice this slight show of irritation. She began to fuss around, explaining the mechanism of the engine just as though I could understand—or Arnold cared. He watched her, saying nothing. But the frown was there still, above the nice brown steady eyes.

We started off; the seat beside Cora empty. Arnold tried to play the part of the punctiliously polite host, but when he saw I expected him to be just his natural unaffected self he relapsed into silence, staring in front of him. I wondered if he was conscious of his wife's charming little grey-clad back.

Soon, we were out at Sunnyside, with a view of a sparkling turquoise-tinted Lake to the left of us.

I must say Cora drove well. Quite carefully, too, for a woman. She did not try to race past other cars, or take corners at a twenty four degree angle.

From time to time she would glance round at us and make some blithesome remark. That her husband responded in a quiet tone did not seem to dampen her spirits. It was always like this with Cora. When she managed to get her own way—and she seldom failed in the endeavour—she was happy and contented.

* * *

I LIKED Arnold. He was a capital fellow; straight and steadfast. Yet, sometimes, I wondered whether he were quite the right mate for Cora. She was so high-spirited, so full of the joy of life; while he preferred his own fireside with a book to the parties and dances to which she dragged him under protest.

"He is very stubborn, and Mrs. Cora does not always win out," said Lucia wisely, on one occasion. But just now, 'Mrs. Cora' was certainly the winner.

We were heading for Oakville and were a short distance past Long Branch when a broken-down car caused a short hold-up of the traffic. Cora had to slow down. Then, just as we were passing the obstruction, a voice hailed us from a Ford behind us. The driver, who was none other than Cecil Gordon, waved a hand and drove ahead at a speed that made the despised "Lizzie" rise in the estimation of a true sportsman.

But Cora bit her pretty lips.

"Merely swank," she said, as she changed into high gear.

Arnold smiled a little.

"Who is the pretty girl with him?" he asked.

"May Harriman," I answered.

Cora's little grey-toqued head went up with a toss.

"It must be a case! Do you call her pretty, Arnold? For my part, I seldom admire a dark woman."

"Nor I, sweetheart," said Arnold softly.

This was a happy augury of renewed domestic felicity. Bless the children! They had to have their little tiffs, I guess.

I settled back in my seat, and watched the panorama of cars passing and meeting us. Gordon's despised Ford was out of sight, because Cora, after a spurt of speed, had not attempted to gain on it.

Arnold was sitting forward, whispering in her ear, that was, happily, not hidden by a disfiguring bun of hair. And Cora's rippling laughter broke out now and again. They seemed to be engrossed with each other, oblivious of the presence of a third person.

The road was comparatively clear of pedestrians, but Cora suddenly applied the brakes, and I saw the reason. A crippled man, had only just hopped out of the way in time to avoid what might have been an accident. He gave a sort of angry glance at the car and its occupants.

And then, Cora burst into a delighted chortle, "Captain Howard!"

She brought the car to a standstill within its length, alongside the disabled veteran.

His expression had quickly changed from resentment to genuine pleasure. Their hands clasped—in fact, he held Cora's for several seconds.

"Miss Logan! This must be my lucky day!" he exclaimed, "And to see you driving—just like old times!"

"Do get in! I want a talk with you. Are you going into Oakville? Oh! its perfectly bully to have met you like this," cried Cora.

The young officer who, by the way, was remarkably good looking, climbed up into the seat beside Cora's without a second glance at the two individuals seated behind.

I tried not to look at Arnold. But I knew, nevertheless, the kind of expression that was on his face. What husband of two months' standing—or of two years' for the matter of that—would accept such a situation without some amount of perturbation?

Cora, the minx, had not corrected her military friend's mode of addressing her, neither did she introduce him to her husband; she chattered and laughed and met the young man's admiring glances with evident pleasure. What husband, I repeat, would accept such a situation with equanimity?

For a short time Arnold sat stiff, breathing hard. I could feel the tense atmosphere, was vaguely apprehensive. Fire is no plaything; even the embers of a quiet man's self-control may burst into flame at an unexpected moment. This, I felt, was one.

Then, Arnold leaned forward. His sharp "Cora!" was a revelation to me. To her, also.

Then, the mischief happened.

You know the sharp curve in the road just before you reach Clarkson, where a rutty lane turns sharply to the right. We were just at that spot when Arnold's utterance caused his little wife to give the steering wheel a wrong turn—at the moment another car was coming towards us at top speed round the bend.

I remember that Captain Howard's hand shot over to the wheel, but too late. Then, there was a crashing sound, an impact that threw us off our seats, a moan of pain.

The next thing I knew I was sitting upon the bank at the side of the lane, and a small crowd had gathered, obscuring my view of the car.

Then, I saw Arnold—saw Cora's frightened young face with teeth bit into her lower lip—and I was thankful. I had quite forgotten Captain Howard.

I struggled to my feet. Someone took my arm.

"Now, don't you worry, Aunt Min. They're both all right. Lucky I was returning," said Gordon cheerfully.

The despised flivver, spick and span, was parked at the side; while the beautiful Super-Six shared the doubtful honour of complete wreckage with that of the high powered Packard that had crashed into it.

It was all confusion, excitement, a clamour of voices, cars arriving and driving off again. And, presently, as the groups dispersed, a lame man was helped along by Arnold; a lame man down whose white cheek blood trickled from a wound at the side of his head.

I looked at Cora. The child was all a-tremble. She gripped my arm, scarcely conscious of what she did.

"Oh! Aunt Min! And it's all my doing! Just as if—he has not suffered enough already!"

There was real anguish in her voice; somehow, I was glad that Arnold was out of earshot.

It was Gordon who took the situation in hand. At the edge of the crowd, pretty dark-eyed May Harriman was standing, feeling out of it all. For a girl used to facing audiences she was curiously nervous and unstrung.

Gordon had the engine of his car started.

"Say, Fletcher," he said, "Suppose you and I get this poor chap to a doc's as soon as possible. The ladies will be all right until we get back."

But Cora would not hear of it.

"It was my fault. I'm coming with you, Mr. Gordon, and Arnold can stay behind. Yes, yes; I want to."

And, as usual, she got her way.

Arnold, May and I went to examine the wreck of the Super-Six, now dragged into the lane. The owner of the other wrecked car had gone off to the nearest garage for help.

We three said little, although May did her best to smooth over difficulties by keeping up a running fire of pleasant inanities. But neither Arnold nor I had heart with which to dissemble how we felt. That was pretty badly, in his case. I knew that the boy was already furiously jealous of the injured veteran.

Arnold was somewhat touchy about his nationality. Bless you, we were all loyal Britishers, but he, at times, would lay down a line between the Old Country and our beloved Dominion. And, to tease him, Cora was apt to put a proud stress on the word "Canadian." He guessed that Captain Howard was a native with whom Cora may have been in love at some time. There is no knowing how far the "green eyed monster" will wriggle.

Soon, however, the Ford was back; Cora with more colour in her cheeks, and Captain Howard an interesting figure, bandaged.

The Ford, being a four seater, accommodated the whole of the party with Arnold huddled up on the floor at the feet of Howard, Cora and May. I was ordered to the seat beside the driver.

I do not know what transpired during the journey back to Toronto, but there did not seem to be much talking taking place, although, once in a while I caught the echo of May's soft voice, the deeper notes of the injured man. The other two were silent, apparently.

Suddenly, Gordon caught my glance, and smiled.

"You should hear her sing, Aunt Min!" he said.

"I hope to, one day" I answered; mentally adding, "In your home, dear boy."

* * *

I DID not see Cora again for several days, and I could not get her on the phone.

Then, one evening, I went over to their home, guessing that I should find her in at that time.

She was sitting upon the verandah, an open magazine on her lap. One little foot was beating a tattoo, and before she caught sight of me I discerned pouting lips, a knitted brow. Something was amiss.

Yet she greeted me with her sunny smile, and we went indoors together.

"Arnold is not home yet," she said. "He phoned through to say he might be late, and would I pack his grip. Looks like a hurried trip, Aunt Min. Of course, I should simply love to go, too; but—"

The little foot started tapping, again.

Why do we women prevaricate? Why did I not tell her I knew she was fibbing? But all I said was a mild,

"Of course, dear."

"You see," continued Cora, "I cannot neglect that poor dear just now, especially as I was responsible—"

She broke off quickly at the sound of a man's footsteps, and Arnold literally blew into the room.

"I have to go to New York to-night," said Arnold, after he had greeted me, "There is, too, the possibility of proceeding to Cuba—very important business that may detain me there a month or two."

Now, if any girl in the world liked travel she was Cora. I thought that the child would jump at the idea of going off to the beautiful Island. Instead, she looked down on the ground.

"You do not want—"

"Oh! dear no," answered Arnold curtly, "I have no intention of interfering with your plans, Cora."

Then, he turned to me.

"My wife has to attend the General Hospital—"

"Cora!" I gasped.

matters of the kind. The majority of married people are so foolish in their belief that a gold circlet metamorphoses human nature.

I saw Arnold looking at me.

"I wonder—?" he began.

He coloured a little.

"Cora may feel lonesome—here. If you could make it convenient—"

"Why, that's splendid," I cried. But I wondered how she would take my ready falling in with Arnold's obvious distaste for leaving her unchaperoned.

To my surprise, she smiled gaily.

"I hate to be alone, and there is nobody I would rather have to stay with me than you, Aunt Min."

So Arnold went off, and I took up my residence with the little wife. But I did not see much of her; she literally lived at the General Hospital.

May Harriman did, too, judging from sundry remarks. The young singer had, it seemed, done concert party work "over there," although she had not met Captain Howard until the day of the motor car mishap.

I noticed that Cora always seemed depressed after the receipt of a letter with the New York postmark. Her temper was uncertain, these days; the little maid-servant gave notice to leave.

I thought of Arnold. He had gone away, nurturing feelings of jealousy which absence would increase. I was sure that he was miserable, believing that his wife cared for another man.

He had reason, I grant. Nevertheless, it was not true. Perverse little Cora loved her handsome young English husband as she had never loved any other being. But, like many wives sure of the one man's devotion, she had played with fire, which is neither a wise nor safe proceeding.

Then, one day she uttered a little moan as she read Arnold's letter. "Aunt Min! He has gone! And he said he would tell me—in case—"

She burst into tears.

Gradually, I learned the facts of the case. Arnold had written that he was leaving for Havana that same day. He sent an address at which letters would

"I don't care—I don't care—"

"But you do," I said.

"I don't! I don't! That's for marrying an Eng—"

"Cora!"

"They are a stubborn, domineering race. Want their wives under their heels. I don't care."

And she rushed away, putting her hands over her ears in order to prevent listening to a homily.

I felt troubled and uneasy. Arnold had virtually left his wilful little wife

"I used not to like Cecil Gordon, Aunt Min."

"But you do now."

"I ought to feel sorry for him. I do—in a way. Still, I am a great believer in mating—"

"My dear, what is it?" I asked, as she paused and looked at me.

"Perhaps, he does not care after all. Anyhow—oh! Auntie, it is quite romantic. And they are rapturously in love with each other—they say he's just crazy about her."

It was all confusion, excitement—a clamor of voices, cars arriving and driving off again. And, presently, as the groups dispersed, a lame man was helped along by Arnold.

in my charge; I felt, therefore, morally responsible for what might happen. I knew that Cora, in her present frame of mind, was capable of going to lengths that would have been impossible under happier conditions.

Yet what could I do to stop any folly? Fortunately, she could not elope with a hospital patient.

I debated in my own mind as to whether duty lay in writing to the absent husband. But there was nothing to tell. The estrangement between them had begun on the day of that unfortunate automobile drive, having its beginnings in the quick jealousy of a man, the caprice of a spoiled girl.

Neither was likely to listen to me, at this stage; would, naturally, put my well-meant efforts towards a better state of affairs to the interference of a meddling old woman who ought to mind her own business.

And it was not that I could write to Arnold that his wife's interest in the sick veteran had waned. Cora stayed at the hospital as long as the authorities permitted; she acted as though he were the object of her tenderest regard.

* * *

I felt at a loose end all the next day. I could settle to nothing. The thought of this matrimonial tangle was worrying me, robbing me of peace and rest. I was very much attached to Cora, and I liked and respected her husband; it seemed nothing short of a tragedy that there should be a "rift in the lute."

I was not in the mood for visiting; therefore, when Lucia rang me up and begged me to go round for afternoon tea, I had a great mind to plead another engagement. But she was insistent, reminded me of recent neglectfulness, finished up by saying that she had some news I never could guess. And I went.

She kept her news, however, until the tea-wagon had been wheeled on the veranda. Then, she said meditatively,

Then spitefully she tore the letter into fragments. "I Don't care—I don't care." "But you do," I said.

She was looking the picture of health.

A sort of sardonic smile pulled down the corners of his mouth.

"Captain Howard happens to be in there as a patient; and as Cora feels she was responsible for his relapse she devotes most part of her days in reading, or singing—"

"Not singing," interrupted Cora, "May Harriman does not let outsiders butt in on her job."

So this was the trouble! The eternal triangle with all its accompaniments of jealousy, suspicion and disillusionment. And this boy and girl on y two months married!

I could not say a word. What third person could! Besides, they might remind me of my lack of experience in find him during the next month or six weeks.

"Gone!" repeated Cora tragically.

Then, spitefully, she tore the letter into fragments.

I gave a feeble smile.

"Who? Gordon—"

"No, you silly old dear. It's Captain Howard and May Harriman. Fancy proposing to a girl from a sick bed! She's too happy for words—and they are going to be married as soon as he is out of the hospital," said Lucia.

Then, I cabled the news to Arnold.

I did not see Cora that evening; she was going to dine with her father, and she did not return until long after I had gone to bed. Then, on the morrow, I found her gone when I went down to breakfast. So you see, I had no chance of discussing the Howard-Harriman engagement with her.

It was one of those extremely hot days that we get mid-July, and after a fatiguing morning's shopping, I decided to take my luncheon down town instead of hurrying home for it. I stopped off and enjoyed a fruit sundae by an open window which topped the crowds of pedestrians and vehicles, and showed me such a sky of sapphire and gold that I could almost fancy that the Rockies, instead of hot and dusty Yonge Street, might be next door.

When I pantingly made tracks for the bungalow I wondered if Cora were home. Then, I saw her waiting on the porch, and her face was radiant.

"I have been dying for you to get back, Aunt Min," she cried, "I've looked up trains and connections and boats and things, and my grip is packed. You'll be a darling and send on the larger luggage."

I unpinned my veil, and flopped into a chair. Such energy! Wonderful youth!

"Where are you going, dear?" I enquired.

She looked at me with mock reproach, and threw a cablegram into my lap.

"Isn't he the greatest, ever? Cuba—and sunshine, and palm trees! Oh! Aunt Min, I'm so impatient to see Arnold again!"

She rattled on like this while I read the adoring husband's message.

And if I had had any doubts as to the complete reconciliation, of the rainbow in the sky of these children's happiness, every dark and brooding one of them fled like motes dancing through the crystal air.

"Now that Captain Howard and May have fixed up things," she said quite seriously, "I feel I can quit with an easy mind. Match-making is a terribly anxious business, Aunt Min., Say! You might do a 'shower' for them in my place."

I declare I would have consented to anything, just then!

THE THREE BEST LOVED.

SUMMER in Canada, the first day of July, with a clear sky overhead, and all the woods and the fields to wander through—what more could one wish for?

At the border of the woods, the east side, that first welcomes the morning sunlight, two children stood watching. It was a simple, yet a beautiful thing, and a sight rare to most of us, for it was a humming-bird, a little ruby-throat, resting, perched on a twig in front of them. The tiny bird stayed but a moment or two, and then darted off and was lost to sight almost at once.

"I like the humming-bird because it is such a tiny bird," said Betty to her brother.

"I like it because it hums," said Joe, "but what I like about it best are the bright red feathers of its throat. Do you know, Betty, I think I like red about the best of all the colors."

"I like rainbows best," said Betty, "but I suppose no one has everything they like best all the time. I like red too, and—"

"O, Betty!" interrupted her brother, "we'll hunt the woods for colors, the prettiest colors. There must be red of course."

Then began a search in and out and everywhere through the woods for everyone and everything that wore a red cap, a red coat, or a red dress.

The children watched for birds, because the ruby-throat had started them upon their color game. A Red-headed Woodpecker drummed for them on a dead limb, and looked at them as if he seemed to know that his bright red head was one of the things the children were looking for. A robin red-breast was next seen in a little, grassy, open space, tugging at a fat worm that it had found.

"I see another 'red,'" cried Betty.

The children were still at the wood's edge, but they had walked to where the little stream flowed lazily through the woods and out and across the fields. There were buttercups here, wild iris, and the bit of red that Betty had seen was the crimson patch on the shoulder of Flamewing, the red-winged blackbird.

They spied an Oriole, in his suit of red-gold and black, close by his swinging nest on the branch of an oak. A Scarlet Tanager flew like a darting flame from sunbeam to sunbeam and a Redstart, perched amongst the leaves, gave a touch of Autumn color to the summer green.

There were other 'reds' to find besides the birds. Chic-Chic, the red squirrel, was the first of these, and Betty wished to count little Saucebox, the chipmunk, too. Copper, the red fox, sly though he was, could not escape the sharp eye that saw him dodging through the underbrush.

The children had wandered to that part of the woods where the stream that runs through it widens into a little pond, where there are reeds and rushes at its margin, tag-alder near the bank's edge, broad, green lily-pads floating on the surface of the shadowy water.

"Look! Look! Betty!" exclaimed Joe in an excited whisper, "There is Grandfather Gurk himself sitting on a lily-pad."

A big, green bull-frog was out in plain view, and seemed to like being looked at. "But Grandfather Gurk isn't a 'red,'" said Betty.

"C-r-r-r-k? Ger-rum!" croaked Grandfather Gurk, the bull-frog.

"O, I know what he's saying," cried Betty. "He's telling us to hunt for 'white ones,' and his nose is pointing straight for that white water-lily."

"Ger-rum!" said Grandfather Gurk, as he plopped off his lily-pad into the water.

Now someone was waiting for just this chance to be counted, and as soon as the bull-frog had gone, he popped around in front of the children and told them who he was, right away. It was Little Tip, the Chickadee, and he was pleased as could be when the children counted him because he had so many white feathers on his coat.

There were ever-so-many birds with part of their suits white, but the children decided that the prettiest of all was the

if it were of armor. He was bold, and almost as saucy as the blue jay, though not quite as noisy. He did not have as much to say as Talky Tooter, but he was twice as proud of his fine clothes.

There was one 'blue' that Joe watched for on their way back through the woods. He thought perhaps Peter, the kingfisher might be somewhere near the pond, but Peter must have had a better place to fish, for not a blue or white feather of him was to be seen.

Joe and Betty seated themselves on a moss-covered log close to the wood's edge from where they had started their morning ramble, and counted all the "reds," the "whites," the "blues" that they had found in their color-search. Betty had just counted the very last "blue," when a little honey-bee rose from a flower, higher and higher, until it was lost in the blue of the summer sky.

"We almost missed the biggest 'blue' of all—the sky," said Betty. "The honey-bee loves blue the best of all the colors; and there is a fluffy, white cloud, and the sunbeams will be all red and gold just before night comes."

"At the border of the woods, the east side that first welcomes the morning, two children stood watching."

Tree-Swallow, who kept on the wing so much of the time that he showed his pure white breast far oftener than he did his greenish-blue back.

It was the Tree-Swallows, though, and the glossy blue of his back and wings, that started the children on the third color. They did not count the swallow as a 'blue,' for he had been counted already among 'the white ones.' They were now just at the wood's edge, with the orchard beyond, and there, in and out amongst the branches of the apple trees, Joy, the bluebird, flew, and hopped, teetered on little twigs, and sang happily all the time.

The children had just lost sight of the bluebird, when from right behind them came the strangest of bird voices. Someone was scolding them, scolding in everything from a squeal to a whistle.

Joe laughed aloud. "It's Talky Tooter, the blue jay!" he exclaimed. "You are jealous of the bluebird just because you weren't counted first, Master Talky."

He was a splendid 'blue,' was Talky Tooter, for he ruffled up his feathers as if to show every blue one that he wore; but he never stopped scolding for a minute.

On a sunlit patch of short grass in the orchard in front of them strutted Chak, the grackle. The rich, burnished blue of his feather-coat glistened in the sunlight as

From where the children sat they could see, across the fields, the farm-house, their home, and above it, on a tall, white staff, a flag was flying.

"There are our three colors all together!" exclaimed Joe. "The flag has the three we like best—red, and white, and blue."

The flag was flying, for this was Dominion Day, the birthday of a united Canada. It was the flag bearing the three colors that the children loved best, the flag they loved best too. They watched it floating there in waving folds of glorious color, and though the children could not hear, the summer breeze was singing:

The breeze that loves the lily, and the bluebell, and the rose,
The fleecy cloud, clear sky, the fire that in the sunset glows;
Its whisper at the dawn brings a glad awakening;
It softly comes, at eventide, its lullaby to sing:
The breeze that loves the prairie, and each field, each lake, each tree,
The garden of contentment, wide, from East to Western sea,
Will ever o'er the homeland keep, o'er all her children, too,
Flying the Flag of Canada, the dear Red, White and Blue.

PEEKING INTO HOUSES

UNTIL this year I have been far more interested in those who live in nests, than in the nests themselves, but most of the feathered folk of hedge and wood are old friends, and from the coming of the first of the summer birds, I decided to watch the making of nest-homes, and learn for myself how and why they were built in different places.

The watching of nest-making would take too long to tell, but there is time and space enough to note a few of the more interesting summer homes.

Late in April, I visited the woods, and, well in from the border of a thicket, I found one of the simplest of nest-homes. Second-growth shoots and saplings of beech and maple crowded in on every side, with the wide-spreading branches of the mother trees shadowing the spot to a constant twilight. The dead leaves of last Autumn lay in a thick bed everywhere, and in a little hollow amongst them, I found four eggs. This was the home of Dodger, the woodcock, and I doubt that I would have noticed it, if I had not been making my way slowly through the thicket, and discovered Mistress Dodger at home.

I do not know whether she trusted me, or whether she thought the protective color of her feathers would enable her to remain undetected, but she sat motionless upon the nest until I almost touched her with my outstretched hand. She rose with a whirr of wings and was lost to view in a moment, and I had my first sight of a woodcock nest.

These birds had made no attempt at nest-building. There were no sticks nor twigs needed, and the leaves where the four eggs nestled, made as soft and cosy a bed as any down-lined bird-home.

The four eggs were half as long again as those of a black bird, but more tapering. The ground color was a warm buff, and they were spotted from end to end with light brown.

I had taken some time to inspect the eggs, the nest and the thicket, so that I might find the place again, and was turning to leave, when I heard a "peep" from quite near. It was a low bird-voice, and I at once thought Mistress Dodger was saying, out loud, to herself, that she was glad I was leaving the neighborhood.

I was not out hunting duck-eggs in particular on this morning in May on which I found the nest home of the Fantops. I like the Fantop family, who are, next to the Wood drake, the handsomest of all our wild ducks. The Hooded Merganser is not at all uncommon about our large inlets and marshes, and is readily recognised by the large, feathered crest that each wears. Then, too, it is the smallest of our ducks, with the exception of that roly-poly, the Buffle-head.

I found the nest of the Fantops in a hollow within an old tree that stood close by the water's edge.

The tree-hole doorway was easily seen, and not more than five feet from the ground. The nest within was lined thickly and comfortably with soft grass and an abundance of down. In this cosy nest were almost a dozen eggs. I could not see them, but tried to count by feeling

Miss Canada

BY CHARLES W. STOKES

THERE is a dear old newspaper man in Nova Scotia who has the habit of brightening his many anecdotes by introducing, in terms of the most David and-Jonathan intimacy, the names of all the great and near-great of this and recent generations. As, for instance: "I said to Borden in '17," he says, "Bob," I said, "you ought to form a Union Government." Said Bob to me, "I think you're right," Bill.

What makes me think of this is the recollection of a conversation which I had some years ago with Mrs. Asquith. Her husband was then still Prime Minister, and I was spending the week-end with them at their beautiful country home in Sussex. On Sunday afternoon, as we sat on the front porch looking towards the golf links, Mrs. Asquith was reading the "Grain Growers' Guide," to which she was a regular subscriber and for which she had a great affection.

She raised her eyes from that periodical suddenly, and said to me: "Charlie, haven't you any girls in Canada?"

"I have to admit," I replied, "that I don't quite get you."

Laughingly, she passed over the "Guide," pointing to a cartoon which showed Canada protesting against something—freight rates, or the tariff, or the bank combine, I forget which. Anyway, Canada was protesting with a typically "Guideish" thoroughness and abandon. "Well?" I interrogated.

"Don't you notice," she smiled, "that in your cartoons Canada is always portrayed as a man, a man in a Stetson hat and high boots, and looking rather like a respectable tradesman? Haven't you any feminine types?"

I came right back at her. "You forget John Bull and Uncle Sam."

"So?" she answered with lightning-like brilliance. "What about La Belle France? But then I have read somewhere in your emigration literature that there are ten men to every woman in Canada, so perhaps that accounts for it."

I mention this episode not to parade my wide acquaintance with the great: merely to show that Mrs. Asquith—to use the colloquialism—had the right slant on things. Even if England is personified in John Bull, and the United States in Uncle Sam, they still have their Britannia and Columbia to play about with. And then there is the fair Hibernia, and her new sister Ulsteria, to say nothing of the Welsh girl, the Scotch lassie, the Spanish Carmen, and the little chrysanthemum lady from Japan.

Of course you do sometimes see Canada as the female of the species—in the pageants, for example, where she rides at considerable risk to equilibrium on a cardboard throne superimposed upon Jones' one-ton delivery truck, which is brightly festooned in red, white and blue. Her bosom is open to freedom and pneumonia, her hundred and sixty odd pounds are cunningly camouflaged in flowing white robes so that you wouldn't for the world think she was anything but the stylish stout type. Grouped around her are her child attendants, the nine little Maple Leaves, all robed ("dressed" would be too prosaic a term) in white, with blue bands round their little foreheads and flourishing little pennants to show which province they all are.

Or now and then you run across Miss Canada in the cartoons, such as when there is something solemn to cartoon—either as a rather robust allegory dropping a wreath on the grave of someone recently deceased, or in high boots with fur round the tops telling people they really ought to buy made-in-Canada goods or patronise the Canadian Government Marine.

The possibility is that we have no Canadian type of woman because there have been so very few outstanding individual Canadian women. This sounds so brilliantly paradoxical (although quite accidentially) that I will go to submit that ever since Leif Ericson discovered this Dominion in Ten Hundred and something, the entire feminine population of Canada has seemingly been occupied in crawling over to where the neutral background is. This may be the Indian influence, the squaw spirit which encourages the brave to don the feathered head-dress and try the light fantastic Sun Dance, while Tiger-Lily-who-grows-Fat-like-the-Rain-Barrel stays home and mends the moccasins; but who, for example, are the heroines of Canadian history? The only reason that we are able to shout "Laura Secord!" is because hers is also the name of a certain sweet. Evangeline? H-m-h-m-not a bad guess: but subject to this remarkable reservation, that nearly all otherwise well-informed persons in the United States most of those in the Old Country, and not a few in Canada itself, cherish the illusion that Evangeline lived somewhere in rural Massachusetts.

THE female of the species seems indeed to have meant almost nothing in Canada's young life. Ever since we began having a history, it has been very much a masculine history. Especially politically. We have had no Mrs. Asquiths, no Mrs. Pankhursts, no Mrs. Wilsons. Our public men have had the pure kind of home life so beloved by our late dear Queen, a home life entirely free from petticoat politics. There were no Mothers of Confederation. The political hostess (meaning thereby the person who in normal circumstances tries to advance her husband by entertaining useful people, and in abnormal circumstances by writing books and crowding him out of the spotlight) is rarer than the rara avis. And as for that kind of political dissipation so popular amongst European statesmen, namely, of rising to be ace-high in the game and then getting badly tangled up with some other woman—why, our Canadian imagination must at the mere thought of this give a spirited performance of the well-known boggling!

We have had, it has been suggested, no Mrs. Pankhursts. There are plenty of clever women in Canada, a few of whom are in public life. We even have women in Parliament; but we have no feminists. Our women reformers—who are a-plenty, Heaven knows—seem to lack the lean and hungry look of the true feminist; they appear all to be well-fed and comfortably married, and in the thing rather for the fun of it than anything else. Perhaps the shortage of women that was the basis of so much of our pre-war immigration literature explains why. The feminist as I understand it, is one who is an anti-masculinist, a person who, in short, wants to equalize the sexes so badly that she is willing to throw stink-bombs, or set fire to public buildings, to show how logical she is. Anyway, both Mrs. and Miss Canada have the vote now, and have all the professions they seem to want open to them, although down to date the only really favorite ones appear to have been stenography and selling things.

All of which last preceding two or three paragraphs is just discursiveness, to show that anybody who is really interested in the subject could have a wonderful old time with himself speculating whether it is a foolish one or not. Where were we at? Oh yes, the lack of a type of Canadian woman. When you say "Englishwoman," or "American woman," or "Frenchwoman," you know exactly what you mean. But when outsiders say "Canadian woman," what mental picture do they form? Our Lady of the Snows, of course, and all that, with a dash of the farmerette and the cow-girl.

I met a very disappointed Englishman recently who had emigrated to Canada largely because no one over there had known enough to check his ardent belief in our farmerettes. He had been searching in vain for them ever since he had landed, having seemingly argued to himself that because this is the agricultural country par excellence and the bread-basket of the jolly old Empire and all that bally rot, the land girl must therefore abound in large numbers. It seems he had had his own little romantic day dreams of taking the plough handles from her into his own strong hands, and of how, when they were married, he and she would ride over together to the postoffice once a week and get his copy of "Punch."

I think one reason why we have no clear picture of a Miss Canada is that our girls do not appreciate the inter-relationship of dressmaking and national life. We are now a Nation—at least, Lloyd George says so, whatever Henri Bourassa may think—but our girls buy all their clothes from New York. Paris modes made the Frenchwoman famous. But Paris did not extinguish the Englishwoman, although Paris is much nearer to England than New York is to Canada. Canadian women do not realize how important a part they must play in the development of a Canadian individuality. Men are the same anywhere. You could put the average citizen-taxpayer of Brandon, Manitoba, alongside his corresponding contemporary in Baltimore, Maryland, and the only superficial difference would be that one wore a shirt with pink stripes while the other wore one with cerise. The encouragement of a National Dressmaking Art would be the first step towards creating our Miss Canada.

Miss Canada, who should be able to say, with Beatrice, that "there was a star danced, and under that was I born!" If I were an artist, I would spend considerable time in this creation of a Miss Canada—a Miss Canada who primarily was highly ornamental, who was slim, whose features were not classic, who did not part her hair in the middle nor wear a bandeau round it, and who was not, in general, built upon the lines of the prima donna (married) in the village revival of "Iolanthe." I would create her as the stunningest girl I could think of, with a face that had Mary Pickford's or Elsie Ferguson's lashed to the mast and squealing for help, with a figure more than slightly reminiscent of a Mack Sennett bathing beauty's. Having done this, I would get legislation enacted to make this Miss Canada the standard design for cartoons, advertisements, postage stamps, and dollar bills, and I would then sit complacently back and watch immigration revive.

OR better still, we might start a competition, something along the lines of that twenty-five-hundred-dollar prize for the best Canadian novel, but bigger. Ten thousand dollars for the best-looking Canadian girl! The judges should include the Prime Minister, one railway president (why I don't know, but railway presidents always seem in on these things), and the editor of this magazine. As the sketches began to pour in, from Port Arthur, Belleville, St. John, Nanaimo, Regina, and so on, it would be very interesting indeed to study whether we should want one girl, or nine.

The Quebec girl, for example, I vision as very Frenchified—a little pale, with black hair, the rustle of silk petticoats (although, of course, they don't wear them in Quebec any more than they do elsewhere) and a flexibility to her shoulders caused by their being so frequently and so eloquently shrugged. She would be slim rather than otherwise, with a very trim foot, the kind of ankle that Dickens loved to call "neat," very delicate eyebrows, and a strong suspicion of perfumery.

I don't know why it is, but the Ontario girl I would imagine as arriving in scores of variations upon that delicious and highly edible vegetable, corn. Perhaps it is because the province, like many of its principal cities, has such a rich, juicy, open-hearted sound. Try it for yourself—"On-tar-i-o"—doesn't it sound happy and rosy and new-mown-hayish? And then try it on "Saskatchewan," which has more than a faint suggestion of being cross-eyed. I never knew an Ontario girl yet who was not contented, who did not think this was a perfectly lovely old world, and who was the slightest degree worried about the next because her natural optimism told her it would be all right. This, incidentally, is the best stock from which the finest reformers are raised. The Ontario girl would be smartly but not piquantly dressed: in other words, her clothes, although expensive, would never be likely to cause a riot on Main Street; and I picture her in the early thirties playing golf desperately in a battle to keep down her weight.

And so we might go on. The Bluenose girl would be there, with her cream-and-peaches complexion, her yellow hair, and her rather (though I don't know why) wistful expression; and the prairie rose, part British, part American, part Scandinavian, but altogether old-fashioned and charming; and the British Columbia girl from some pretty fruit valley, tanned and rather boyish and with bobbed hair; and the Yukon girl, and the Charlottetown girl, and so on and so forth for as many kinds of girls as there are in Canada. These are only dream pictures of what they might be, pictures that I get from reading the newspapers published where they live. For all I know they may be entirely different, and any way, if I knew too much, it might be unsafe for my own conjugal relations.

But the pictures being all received, and the prize awarded, or most likely split many ways, the next move would be up to the Honorable Mr. Stewart, Minister of Immigration and Colonization. Realizing that the greatest need of Canada today is men, he would have a nifty new cover designed for his fascinating booklets about Canada. Instead of those very ordinary and unexciting pictures of fat cattle, velvety alfalfa patches, and luxurious farm houses, which you can buy in any part of the world if you have enough money, he would use this picture of Miss Canada.

Probably, of course, it would be easier, and would save him a terrific number of questions in Parliament, if he used ten pictures. He would make his cover a mess of engraving, serving as a background for ten frames. In the large one in the centre, he would have to use a composite, combining the fluffy curls of Ontario with the inscrutable eyes of Quebec, the debutante expression of the Maritime provinces with the winsomeness of the prairies and the well-bred "touch me not" of the far Pacific. In each of the nine surrounding circles he could insert a picture of the prettiest girl in each province, clearly labelled, so that those who liked (for example) blondes would know exactly where to go, and would not make the mistake, which has occurred too often in our existing immigration policy, of locating in a part of Canada unsuited to them.

No mountains or seashore for him.

How comfortable he will be at home depends largely upon you

The mountains, the lakes, the sea—are yours.

His is the stuffy office, and the empty house.

His summer months of city-bound life can be woeful and dreary, or cheerful and pleasant, as you will.

Men don't mind shifting for themselves. But a little thoughtful preparation will insure their comfort. Provide for plenty of clean, cool sheets; for clean, crisp clothes; for a soap-and-water bath twice a day—who wants more than these, wants luxury!

A head-to-foot lathering with Ivory Soap and cold water, a quick rinse, a good dinner, and the loneliest of summer-widowers will feel—exiled, yes, but still solvent and hopeful.

Make sure you leave enough Ivory Soap. He will use it for his baths, his face and hands, his shampoo—and he'll use a mighty lot of it.

Ivory is a fine homelike soap for him, for seven distinct reasons: It is pure and mild, white and fragrant, it lathers abundantly and rinses off quickly—and “it floats”!

Whenever soap comes into contact with the skin—use Ivory.

The Right Atmosphere

BY MAUDE GARNHAM SMITH

NOT long ago, I was talking with a man who works in a large conservatory—He was telling me of the great care which is taken to keep the atmosphere just right for the growing plants, and the temperature just so, in order that each plant may do its very best to become perfect. Some plants require more sunshine than others, some more moisture; others again, require different degrees of heat. He told me, too, of the watchman who keeps the fires all the night long, so that the plants do not become chilled and their growth retarded. This particular florist specializes in violets and carnations, and there are great houses specially built for them, so that they may have plenty of room to flourish and to grow and give perfect blooms.

Great care is taken, too, in packing the flowers, and they are sent to their destination by the very best possible methods, so that they may arrive in perfect condition, and give the buyers complete satisfaction.

Somehow, I fell to thinking of our human flowers, the girls and boys of this great Canada we love so well. Are we giving them the "right atmosphere" in our homes? Our schools and Sunday Schools have much indeed to do with the moulding and influencing of character. Too much cannot be said in praise of each, but it is the parents and the homes which really should exert the greatest influence in the lives of our children.

I sometimes wonder if we display enough interest in their amusements and sports. Most of us live busy lives, and time is very precious, but cannot something, some task, go undone? Surely the welfare of our children should come before everything else.

First, and always, let us teach them the joy and the dignity of work and the satisfaction which comes to one after performing a task perfectly, whether just some little ordinary bit of work about the home, or the daily routine of lessons at school.

Let us show them the beauty and strength of unselfishness—Teach them to reverence truth, to be considerate of others, and especially thoughtful for aged persons. A smile and a kind greeting are such little things to give, but they often fill a whole day with gladness for the recipient.

I was watching once with a relative at the bed-side of her father. He was slipping quietly away into that great "Tomorrow," which awaits us all. He had been unusually prosperous, and had delighted in giving his children many advantages, not common in those days, but it was not of those that she was thinking, but of the love and care that had never failed. "No matter," she told me, "how busy he was, or how weary, he was never too busy to listen to our childish troubles, never too weary to love and comfort us."

The books our children read should be chosen wisely and well. After the long years which have elapsed since childhood, I know of nothing better than Louisa M. Alcott's "Little Women," with its real girls and real boys. I wish every young girl would read Ethel Hueston's "Prudence of the Parsonage," and if a real touch of romance is longed for, try that sweet little story of Elizabeth Cooper's, "The Heart of O'Sono San," and walk with her along the paths strewn with cherry blossoms, (but paths of renunciation, as well) in far away old Japan. Our own L. M. Montgomery's "Anne," books, also "The Story Girl," "The Golden Road," and "Rilla of Ingleside," are sweet and life-like. The memory of them lingers for many a day. Would you read of other countries far afield? I have in mind a copy of "The Other Side of the Lantern," by Sir Frederick Treves, beautifully bound and illustrated, and so artistically written that the reader feels that he has really known and seen the places described.

Then, any of Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell's splendid books, telling of the Labrador people, are so well worth while, and so fascinating for both girls and boys, alike.

William Francis Butler, that great explorer, and gallant Irish gentleman, has left us a heritage rich indeed. "The Great Lone Land" tells of our own wind-swept Canadian prairies, and "The Wild North Land" of the swamps and forests, lakes and rivers far beyond.

Arthur Heming, Ernest Thompson Seton, and Charles G.D. Roberts, have written stories which may be read again and again. They never fail to interest and instruct.

There is so much of the good and the beautiful in music, that I wonder how some of this hideous "jazz" stuff can be endured for a moment. Surely the loving care that is put into the manufacture of a good piano must make the instrument itself feel grievous insult when giving forth such a jumble of sounds.

Let us never become too busy to give our children the right amount of care and love (that sunshine of the soul) so that they may develop properly both in mind and body, and arrive at their destination of sweet, sane womanhood, and strong splendid manhood, in perfect condition, pure of heart and of soul. If we parents can achieve this result, then, like the florist with his violets and carnations, we shall not have labored in vain.

ELIZABETH Allen had her first glimpse of the situation before she had been a week in her son's house. What had happened was simple enough, but it gave her food for thought. Luke was sitting in his mother's room when Ada came in. Luke's back was toward the door and he did not turn his head at his wife's approach. When she put her hand on his shoulder and said:

"Luke," in a low tone,—"Well, Ada," he replied, and there was a perceptible tinge of resignation in his voice, the voice of a man who says, "Well, I'm in for it now."

At that, without another word, Ada fled from the room like a whirlwind. That the door didn't slam behind her was a tribute to her early upbringing.

Luke Allen glanced at his mother, shrugging his shoulders. Mrs. Allen asked succinctly:

"What ails Ada?"
"I wish you'd tell me what 'ails Ada,'" he burst out impatiently. "I don't pretend to understand women." Then he added dryly, "Ada has a great many 'feelings,' you know—any amount of them."

"Do you mean her feelings are hurt?" his mother asked. She was very much bewildered. Never in her well-ordered life had she fled whirlwind-like from any room, nor could the circumstances have arisen to make her act in this way. To her question her son answered again.

"Oh, I suppose so." His tone was weary; the boyish blitheness which made him so charming died out. Mrs. Allen's serene brow wrinkled itself into a perplexed little frown.

"I am afraid, my son, that you and Ada are not as happy as I should like to see you."

"Oh, we jog along," said Luke.

He rose in the same weary, lack-lustre way. He knew so well what would happen next. It was part of the emotional treadmill that Ada should come to dinner as full of gaiety as a child. She was dressed in a lovely pink gown, ruffled like a rose, its silken rustling talking eloquently of parties.

The Turn of the Flood

BY MARY HEATON VORSE

"Where are we going to-night?" Luke asked, and let Ada read in his eyes how very lovely she was.

"To the Tallent's," she answered, and shot him a look of suspicion, as if to surprise any latent unwillingness in him. He caught the look, and his face fell, but when they drove off together, Luke's blitheness had returned and Ada was in the best of high spirits. As Mrs. Allen saw them off, they seemed to her the incarnation of youth and gaiety, and she went to bed with the consoling picture of them, though still perplexed as to what the scene had been about.

Elizabeth Allen had always had an unspoken pride in Ada. She enjoyed watching the neighbors stare at Ada's dresses, and at Ada herself, who was so incomparably more splendid than anyone else's daughter-in-law. Not that she felt comfortable with Ada, for Ada was to the little, quiet lady larger than life; the intensity of her enthusiasms, her loud ringing gaiety, seemed to Mrs. Allen like some elemental quality which might at any moment sweep away all the familiar landmarks.

The first week had begun her life of surprises. Breakfast had been the first.

"Doesn't Ada come down?" she asked.

"Never!" Luke had replied, with a satisfaction in his emphasis which fore-shadowed their attitude toward each other.

Breakfast became a pleasant hour to mother and son. Soon Luke formed the habit of going to his mother's room when he came home from business. His mother would greet him with a gentle, "Have you had a satisfactory day, my son?" and further made no demand upon him. They talked very little together, for between them was always the shadow of Luke's and Ada's last unpleasantness—and there always was a last unpleasantness. Between scenes, so to speak, Ada would be gay and gracious, while Luke unbent also; but like a careful mariner in strange waters, he was never quite at his ease. He was perpetually on the watch for shoals, his ear quick for the sound of breakers, and often fancying he heard them where there were none. Ada would ask, for instance, in all candor:

"You can't come with me to-night, can you?"

"I can't, as you know," Luke would reply, and then add gratuitously, "And I would be glad if you wouldn't make a scene about it."

"There is trouble and to spare in this house," was Mrs. Allen's summing up of her first days under her son's roof. "What irritated Luke so, and why were Ada's feelings hurt?" was what she asked herself, after one of Ada's furious exits, as Luke walked the floor.

The walking of floors and the flying from rooms was only the beginning. They soon became so used to her quiet presence that by the time she had completed her first month with them, they were morally, so to speak, in their shirt-sleeves, their stocking-feet on the table. As they quarreled at their ease before her, Mrs. Allen would sit very quiet, her heart beating like a trip-hammer. Each storm left her in fear of a worse; she was fully prepared for the cyclone. Yet, when it came at last, she was as shaken as if she had never expected such a thing. It began in a trivial way, as did all their storms. Luke said:

"Oh, I suppose I've got to go to-night—though I'd give a dollar to stay home."

Ada replied quickly:—"You needn't go if you don't want to."

What was there in that to warn one the cyclone was coming?

"Why can't you go without me?" Luke asked. At that Ada drooped—she could droop like a sunstruck flower.

"For heaven's sake, don't cry!" Luke gave back, turning to his paper, "I shall go whether you do or not."

It was when Luke actually went without Ada that the cyclone broke, for Ada burst into an abandon of weeping the like of which Mrs. Allen had never seen. It appalled her; she would have been glad to fly from it, but a certain awful fascination held her; besides, she didn't dare to go, for it didn't seem possible that anyone could give way to such grief without ill consequences. After a while, the fury of the storm abated, and died away with the suddenness of cyclonic storms, leaving behind the wreck of Ada. Her beautiful hair was disheveled into tragic strands, her eyes were puffed and swollen; there were dark red marks on her wrists, where she had dug her nails deep in.

"I wish I were like you," she said, for Mrs. Allen had weathered the gale sitting quietly in her chair. She had fluttered over to Ada and had murmured timid comforting words which were as straws in the flood of Ada's agony, and had fluttered back to her chair, in horrified silence, but outwardly unshaken.

"I suppose you think I'm an awful fool," Ada said next.

Elizabeth Allen didn't answer; she felt as if what she had passed through had carried all her words away.

"It isn't, you know, just because Luke went without me," Ada explained, in a matter-of-fact tone. "It's because we're—drifting away from each other." And the little break in Ada's voice touched Mrs. Allen more than all the tears she had shed.

"Oh, Luke's so blind—blind—blind! He doesn't see where we're going! I can't make him see. We're losing each other, Luke and I; we're losing each other!"

Ada rose to her feet, towering a tragic figure before the little woman.

"You must have seen me trying. You must have seen me coming to him all affection, fairly offering my heart to him—"

This beautiful painting, "Goose and Goslings," by William Maris, was an admired feature of the collection belonging to the late E. F. B. Johnston, Esq., of Toronto.

The natural fruit flavors of jellies and preserves sealed with Imperial Parowax are a constant source of wonder and delight.

It is the air-tight seal that does it. Preserves, jellies, fruits and vegetables simply cannot lose their flavor because neither air nor moisture is able to effect them.

Just a thin layer of melted Imperial Parowax poured over the cooled preserves, and the job is done. When tops are used, dip in melted Parowax and the same air-tight seal is secured.

A little Imperial Parowax added with soap loosens the dirt and whitens clothes in boiling. Added to starch and rubbed over irons it gives a finished lustre to laundry.

Ask for Imperial Parowax by name. It is sold by grocers, druggists, and department stores everywhere.

IN the volume, "Later English Poems" (1901-1922), selected and edited by J. E. Wetherell, B.A., we have a collection of golden verse, none the less valuable for its recent mintage. To those who have not been following closely the writings of modern English poets, this collection will be a revelation of richness and rarity. Nearly fifty of the poems in this volume, that is, nearly half of them, are related, directly or indirectly to the Great War. More than sixty poets are represented by their work, which is of so high a standard that we need not listen to the croakings of the critics who are pessimistic concerning English poetry. In the preface, the statement is made—"The editor's individual preference, notwithstanding the perils which beset such a guide to selection, has, in the main, governed his choice." Mr. Wetherell's taste may be safely trusted, as those who have read former compilations made by him are well aware. His devotion to classic and poetic studies has resulted in such publications as make his readers feel deeply indebted to the editor whose toil and discrimination achieve such satisfying results.

It is difficult, in these days, for most readers—even those who are lovers of poetry—to become familiar with modern productions. For such, this volume is especially valuable, as the selection is as careful as the list of writers is complete. The biographical notes add interest to a collection in which there are no inferior numbers.

Of the war poems, none is nobler in strain than "Into Battle," by that gallant sportsman and soldier, Julian Grenfell, who gave his life for the cause of freedom, dying in May, 1915:—

"And Life is Colour and Warmth and Light,

And a striving forevermore for these;
And he is dead who will not fight;
And who dies fighting wins increase."

Of the poems in gentle, descriptive strain, none is more elfinly lovely than Walter de la Mare's "Silver,"—a bit of nocturnal rapture which is magical in its melody:

"Slowly, silently, now the moon Walks the night in her silver shoon."

Every poem in this collection is worth reading more than once:—and the last, "Day's End," by Dorothy E. Norman-Smith, is not the least. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto, Price $1.50).

Islands suggest adventure—and, when the island is in far-away tropical seas, we are sure that anything may happen. Robert Gordon Anderson has written a story, "The Isle of Seven Moons," in the course of which, as one might expect, many marvellous things occur. The title is not suggestive of prohibition, but the gentle reader may be assured that the "Seven Moons" have nothing to do with the effect of "tarrying long at the wine." The story proves, as the sub-title announces, "a romance of uncharted seas and untrodden shores." Benjamin Boltwood is a frank, high-hearted sailor lad, with nothing to roughen the course of his true love for Sally Fell, except the hostility of her father. The love of Ben and Sally is entwined with the story of the Isle of Mystery, and altogether the romance is of the good, old-fashioned kind, with the gleam of pirates' gold to give a grim touch to the chronicle. (Published by the Ryerson Press, Toronto, Price, $1.75).

While the work of Mrs. Deland is not of the same jewelled craftsmanship as that of Mrs. Wharton, the former has an established place—and a high one—among the American writers of the day. The latest novel by Mrs. Deland, "The Vehement Flame" is not, however, that writer at her best. Mrs. Deland has made a study of jealousy—and the study is tiresome rather than tragic. Of course when a marriage takes place, in which the husband is nineteen years of age and the wife, thirty-nine, we know what is going to happen. Maurice, the alleged hero, is a weak-minded young thing, but his mature wife is an ineffable bore. She is so lachrymose, so neurotic, that the reader is heartily sick of her before she betakes herself to a none-too-early tomb. There is the inevitable complication with a girl of low type (of course she is called "Lily") and there is a really fine youngster named Edith who is far too good for Maurice but who apparently is going to be his second matrimonial venture. Mrs. Deland has done better work than this—and probably will return to her early form. (Published by Hodder and Stoughton, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

Onoto Watanna is the pen name of a writer of Canadian birth (Mrs. Reeves) whose home has recently been in Alberta. "A Japanese Nightingale" is this writer's most popular production, and the autobiographical romance called "Me," which appeared serially in "The Century" was highly successful as a sensation. Her latest book, "Sunny-San," will appeal to many readers, especially those of the "flapper in a hammock" order. Indeed, a box of marshmallow fudge would not go badly with this sentimental tale concerning the adventure of the daughter of Madame Many Smiles. "Sunny-San," whose light-footed mother has just died, takes her place on the tight rope, displeases her owner, Hirata, by repulsing an admirer and is about to be beaten by the annoyed Hirata when four young American students come to the rescue, and their leader, Jerry Hammond, carries off Sunny-San, who is then a mere child. The young men, in a kindly but careless mood, form a syndicate to look after the small Japanese maiden, who is partly white in parentage. Sunny-San is not entirely happy in a missionary household and suddenly arrives in the city of New York, to take up her abode with Jerry Hammond. The reader can imagine the complications which ensue. Sunny-San discovers her father in Senator Wainwright, a "steel magnate" whose wife takes kindly to the new step-daughter and whisks her off to be "finished" in Europe. There is the usual conventional ending, the only out-of-the-way feature being a proposal by the heroine, herself. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto. Price, $1.75).

* * *

We are not surprised by the information that the author of "Man-Size," William Macleod Raine, was born in Scotland. Mr. Raine tells the story of fairly wild life in the West, with a vigor and realism which should delight all those who have not out-lived a fondness for stories about Indians and border fights. The tale opens with an account of how Jessie McRae smashes several liquor kegs which whiskey runners from Montana are trying to rush into forbidden territory. There is an actual fight between Tom Morse and Jessie—and the latter proves herself a thoroughly aggressive young woman by stabbing him in the arm. Tom ultimately turns out a decent citizen and overlooks the detail of the wounded arm. There is a terribly wicked villain, Bully West, and, altogether the story pursues the beaten paths of wild west fiction, although it is difficult to tell just where "America" becomes Canada. Sir Patrick Manson

BY DR. HELEN MACMURCHY

WHO made the tropics safe for the white man and broke forever the fatal chain of events which once made Sierra Leone and many other tropical possessions of Britain and other countries "The White Man's Grave?"

It was Patrick Manson, who died a few weeks ago, Sunday, April 9th, 1922.

Born Oct. 3rd, 1844, the son of a Scottish Squire, John Manson of Fingask, Aberdeenshire, Patrick Manson studied at the Universities of Aberdeen and Edinburgh and graduated in medicine in 1865, when he was only twenty-one years of age. The fact that this Scotch lad got a good medical education helped to change the history of the British Empire, for it was his discoveries that robbed tropical diseases of their terrors and made it possible for trade and commerce to be carried on safely in the tropics.

His career was decided, in one sense, when he went to Formosa in 1866, as medical officer to a group of foreign missionaries and merchants in that island. He really remained to the end of his days, in spirit at least, the general practitioner, the family physician. He once wrote to a scientific friend:

"Men like myself in general practice are but poor and very slow investigators, crippled as we are with the necessity of making our daily bread." Yet while he was making his daily bread he gained a clinical acumen and a practical judgment which stood him in good stead when he wrestled not only with problems hitherto deemed insoluble, but with problems that had hardly been recognized before his day.

He had a truly scientific mind, an enthusiastic and comradely spirit and a deep love of truth, so that he had an influence far beyond the influence of ordinary men.

In a letter to his son-in-law written in 1909 we can see how his own mind worked. "Never refuse to see what you do not want to see or which might go against your own cherished hypothesis or against the views of authorities. These are just the clues to follow up as is also and emphatically so the thing you have never seen or heard of before. The thing you cannot get a pigeon-hole for is the finger-point showing the way to discovery."

Three pictures may serve to illustrate the life of this man to whom the British Empire owes so much, this man whose name will always be closely associated with one of the greatest discoveries in Modern Preventive Medicine—viz.—that the weapon of Death in many tropical diseases is the sting and bite of an insect.

The first picture stands out against the background of the island of Formosa, and in the foreground is the young Scotch doctor applying the best of his medical knowledge, gained in one of the most renowned medical schools in the world, to the care and cure of patients brought to him. The doctor is completely baffled and quite unsuccessful, and he can find no help in his medical books.

In that hour he hears the call of the pioneer—a call repeated when he goes to Amoy in China. He must discover this unknown part of a doctor's field of work. He must build up the necessary knowledge from the very foundation.

In a lecture delivered at St. George's Hospital in 1897 Dr. Manson gave an account of these "unpleasant but enlightening experiences."

The second picture is dated seven years later and shows Dr. Manson back in London on one of his frequent visits for study. It is the year 1874. He hears that Timothy Lewis in 1872 had found a tiny parasite which he called by the name "filaria" in the blood of patients suffering from elephantiasis, one of the dread diseases Dr. Manson met with in Formosa and Amoy. This is to him a valuable clue. Returning to Amoy he trains two Chinese medical students as laboratory assistants, one to work by day and one to work by night, and examines the blood of one thousand Chinamen for this parasite.

The Chinese student on night duty finds parasites very often; the student on day duty finds them very seldom. Another clue. The thought strikes Dr. Manson that as the parasite cannot enter the blood itself, it must be conveyed into the blood by some insect which bites at night, most likely the mosquito. After many months of work he proves this true by actually finding the filaria in the act of passing through the proboscis of the mosquito into the body of the patient, and thus we learned how to prevent elephantiasis.

The third picture shows Dr. Manson joining battle with malaria, the most fatal obstacle to the residence of the white man in the tropics. Laveran, a French army surgeon, had discovered the "plasmodium"—the malarial parasite—in 1880. But for ten years no further step was taken. No use was made of the discovery. In the hand of Dr. Manson this discovery, and his own discovery about elephantiasis, became a two edged sword. He was convinced that the mosquito conveyed the parasite of malaria into the body of the patient. But how to prove it? Dr. Manson wished to organize an expedition to British Guiana in 1894 to find out the truth or error of his conviction. The British Medical Association and the Royal Society were jointly to provide the funds. The Royal Society could not find the money! So the plan failed. But Dr. Manson with the generosity of the great gave his sword to one of his pupils, and armed with Dr. Manson's sword, Dr. (now Sir) Ronald Ross of the Indian Medical Service returned to India. The other side of the picture shows the marvellous success of Dr. Ross, who, after a long time and much hard and discouraging work in India, at last proved that what Dr. Manson had long foretold was actually true.

Another gigantic foe remained to fight—the apathy, opposition and unbelief of the profession and the public. There is no more thrilling drama in the history of medicine than that which was played, under the direction of Dr. Manson, at the hospital Santa Spirito in Rome, on the Roman Campagna and in a London Hospital and the London School of Tropical Medicine. Doubt was not only met and conquered. It was rendered impossible.

Sir Patrick Manson will always be remembered as the Father of Tropical Medicine and the founder of the London School of Tropical Medicine. That school was another example of his genius for team work. His yoke-fellow in this team was the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain. Mr. Chamberlain saw what Dr. Manson's discoveries meant and had a vision of what they would lead to. Dr. Manson was medical adviser to the Colonial Office. It is said that a lecture by him at St. George's Hospital Medical School, London, in 1898 caught Mr. Chamberlain's attention and fired his imagination. No doubt the reader will be reminded here of another thrilling tale—how Mr. Chamberlain discovered the value of the school child as a sanitary reformer, in Africa.

The London School of Tropical Medicine was founded in 1899. Forever after Tropical Medicine rested on a sure foundation. No man can number the lives, or the fortunes, saved by the work of Patrick Manson.

Full of years and full of honours—honours from his King and from the whole scientific world—he kept up his interest and his love of life and work to the last. Only fourteen days before the end came, eager and enthusiastic as ever, he paid the visit which was to be his last to the London School of Tropical Medicine, examining and pointing out the importance of some microscopic preparations with all his old interest and keen judgment.

Almost his last words expressed his confidence in a still greater future for the London School of Tropical Medicine in co-operation with the new Institute of Hygiene under the Rockefeller Scheme.

Sir Patrick Manson was married in 1875 to the daughter of Captain J. P. Thurburn, R.N. They had two sons, one of whom, Dr. Philip Thurburn Manson helped his father in his scientific discoveries, and three daughters, one of whom married Dr. Philip Manson Bahr.

Those Utilitarian Rooms

BY COLLIER STEVENSON

THE pantry, the laundry, the bathroom—important as they are in their bearing upon the comfort and general well being of a household, those utilitarian rooms are, nevertheless, all too frequently given but scant attention, both in the planning and equipping of the modern home. Possibly this neglect can in part be traced to a strange adherence to the old—but happily long-exploded!—theory that usefulness and beauty cannot be compatible. As a matter of fact, there is beauty in even the most utilitarian of objects: or, at least, there are potentialities which can be developed into beauty. The only trouble is that many of us are too much occupied with other matters to search out all the beauties hidden around us.

Beauty is, of course, a variable thing of many forms and different degrees. Beauty as we visualize it in a living room or on a porch would, therefore, neither be discernible in nor appropriate for a pantry or a laundry. On the one hand, it is a quality largely composed of attractive color and interesting design; on the other hand, a fusion of comfort, convenience and sanitation. Yet who can say that the one type of beauty is less desirable, less potent than the other?

As elements in an adequately-equipped service department, the pantry and the laundry are only in a very slight degree of less moment than the kitchen itself. Let us, then, delve deep enough to unearth some of the possibilities which the laundry and the pantry hold.

Although a laundry can be omitted in a very modest house, a pantry is almost indispensable, irrespective altogether of the scope of the home. The size of a pantry cannot, of course, be established by any rule other than necessity. That is, the size properly varies, not only with the dimensions of a house, but with the scale of living and entertaining maintained by the owner. The size should, however, always be such that the greatest number of workers likely to use the pantry at any one time may pursue their respective duties without a constant jostle of elbows and fear of collision.

The nature and the location of the doors have an important bearing upon the matter of collisions, too. For example, the doors leading from the pantry to the kitchen and the dining room should be of double-swinging type—and, to avoid any possibility of accident, these should have at least some small panes of glass set in at average eye-height. If any other doors be necessary, they can very advantageously be of the sliding type, both to save floor space and to guard against accident.

Cleanliness is a dominating attribute of the ideal pantry: and it is one easily achieved by proper discernment in the choice of finishes for woodwork, walls and floor. For the first-named, either an oiled finish of the natural wood or a hard enameled coat is satisfactory. For the walls, a dado of tile or Keen's cement may be used, with the upper walls and the ceiling finished with paint. With equally good results, the entire wall and ceiling surfaces may be painted: or, if preferred, a covering of oilcloth or washable paper may be used.

The floor treatment is largely a matter of personal predilection. Many housekeepers like a well-waxed hardwood surface, while others prefer a floor of cement or tile. Cork and rubber tilings are also deservedly popular; for they are resilient, non-slippery, noiseless and sanitary. They are available in a number of pleasing colors which paves the way to a floor of both interesting design and attractive coloring. Inlaid linoleum is still another solution of the pantry floor problem.

Ample daylight is desirable in any pantry: and good ventilation facilities are equally to be desired. Under the window provided to meet these requirements of light and air, the pantry-sink can be advantageously located. Care should be exercised in having this sink at just the right height to avoid tiresome bending. Another point to remember is this: if the sink basin be broad and rather shallow thus admitting only a few dishes at one time, it will prove an economy in the matter of broken china—as there is a great likelihood of china being broken when it is not visible under the water.

IF not prohibitive on account of the space or the expense, two features can very profitably be added to the equipment of a pantry. The first is a gas or an electric plate-warmer, which insures dishes intended to be served hot reaching the dining room in that condition, instead of half-cooled: the other is a small refrigerator, either built-in or portable, to conveniently hold certain requisites of every meal, such as cream and butter, also any special frozen desserts.

Shelves are, of course, part and parcel of a pantry—even though in so many pantries they are useful neither in arrangement nor size. As a matter of fact, shelves should be planned with infinite care, and always with some definite service in mind. For example, those built merely for china should be either just wide enough for a single row of dishes or else provided

Beneath the window which generously lights this well-arranged pantry, there is a wide, shallow sink fitted with two drain-boards. The built-in, glass-doored cupboards, which are conveniently near the sink, occupy one entire wall and part of another. The floor is covered with cork in a quiet gray-green color and all the woodwork is finished in ivory-white enamel. Above the high dado of white tile that extends around the room, the walls are finished in a very light gray paint and the ceiling is painted to match.

In this sunny bathroom, hexangular white tile forms a thoroughly sanitary floor, that joins the white-tiled dado in a cove—thereby avoiding the collection of dust. The walls above the dado as well as the ceiling, are finished alike in pale yellow paint. The woodwork—of which there is but little is, however, enameled in ivory-white. The towel-racks are of glass, but the lighting fixtures and other incidental furnishings are of nickel.

Those Utilitarian Rooms

with grooves or wooden strips to prevent the falling of the dishes. Shelves intended for boxes or tall tins should, on the contrary, be broad: and they should be sufficiently separated to permit the lifting of lids without the removal of a single tin or box. "No high shelves to serve as a catch-all for useless odds and ends" is a very good rule to follow in equipping the modern pantry; and another rule is equally applicable—"A definite place for everything, easily within reach, yet not in the way."

Turning now to the laundry, it is obvious that cleanliness, convenience and good ventilation should be the outstanding characteristics. The ventilation is, perhaps, of the greatest importance—for what odor is more penetrating than that of hot steam and soapsuds? Of course, when the laundry is located in the basement, the matter of a disagreeable odor is apt to be less annoying than in the case of a laundry which is placed upon the first floor. The basement location is, however, in other ways very far from ideal—except when the contour of the site is such, that windows of adequate size can be arranged above the grade-line. For pleasant working conditions, then, a first floor location should be provided, in order that the laundry may be generously lighted at all seasons of the year, properly heated when necessary and easily ventilated as occasion demands.

Cleanliness is just as desirable in the laundry as in the pantry. All that has been said relative to the finish of walls, woodwork and floor earlier in this discussion is, therefore, applicable again. Preferably, too, the chosen finishes should be fairly light in color—for it is but scant recommendation to say of any detail of color or finish in either the pantry or the laundry that "it does not show the dirt easily." Infinitely better is the finish that does show the dirt, as the careful owner will see to it that the dirt never has a chance to show.

Space and place promote an orderly arrangement. Space, then, should be reserved adjacent to a laundry for a closet large enough to afford a suitable place for laundry utensils when they are not in actual use. By this simple expedient, irons, ironing-boards, soap and all the other paraphernalia of wash-day are concealed without any trespass upon convenience. Of course, in many modern laundries the ironing-board is built-in, to fold back into a shallow closet when not in use. An ironing-board of this type, when fitted with electric irons, is especially convenient—and, in addition, it is of value as a space-saver.

Whenever practicable, gas or electric irons should be used in the home laundry. They are available at a moment's notice: and they are particularly commendable during hot weather, as they do not involve the heat which must be endured when ironing is done by the ordinary old-fashioned method.

Nothing is of greater import in a laundry than good tubs, unless it be the suitable location of this equipment. Preferably, the tubs should be so placed that they will be flooded with light: and they should be very accurately gauged as to height, in order that the laundress may be spared superfluous stooping. Rubber mats, placed before the tubs and also beside the ironing-board, will likewise be appreciated by any laundress as a safeguard against tired feet.

Art in a laundry? Apparently, the manufacturers of washing-machines have limited to bring that very thing about: for many of the washing-machines now available are as pleasing in design as they are artistic in coloring. Indeed, with one of these colorful machines as nucleus, the amateur home-decorator can achieve, even in the once-neglected laundry, a color-scheme of marked distinction and real charm.

So far have we advanced in the gentle art of home-making, that there is to-day but one acceptable standard for the modern bathroom—and that is absolute cleanliness. On the surface, such a standard would appear to be neither hard to

Some Thoughts on Musical Education

The part schools and colleges can play in the movement

BY HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

THIS is the time of year when those interested in music from the educational standpoint have an opportunity for taking stock, so to speak. Throughout May and early June in our larger cities many pupils' recitals and "closing concerts" illustrate the progress that is being made; and by July the directors of many institutions, ladies' colleges, conservatories, and the like, are planning the work for the next scholastic year. Within recent weeks I have heard a great many young people, ambitious to shine as singers, pianists and violinists, and have been impressed with the progress in artistic feeling and technique which has taken place in this country in the course of two decades. Some of these aspirants have come from colleges where they are acquiring general education as well as musical proficiency; and without disparaging the accomplishments of their mothers, I think it may be said that the average student of to-day has a better grasp of the art as a whole than was the case in days gone by. I think this is largely due to the fact that in most of our private educational institutions, the standard of tuition has been raised. So far as my own city of Toronto is concerned, musical education has ceased to be a purely local matter for the higher grade of teachers. Many of the more noted professionals do a good deal of travelling in the course of the academic year, not for the purpose of giving public performances, but for that of teaching in colleges and conservatories. A "closing concert" in Toronto in connection with some of the larger institutions is not merely an exhibition of local talent. The more promising young soloists often come from other towns and from other provinces.

It has struck me that a general talk about musical education might be timely. It is one of the tritest of sayings that a real music teacher is a rara avis, but it is a kind of rare bird which we have been lucky enough to acclimatize in Canada in considerable numbers, if one may judge by recent results.

Nevertheless there must be always a wide margin for compatibility and mutual preferences. One teacher may utterly fail to do anything important for a beginner; where another will succeed. It does not necessarily follow that the one who has failed in a particular case is a bad teacher. There are subtle temperamental problems in the relations between teacher and pupil which are difficult to define. Part of the progress that has been made has been due to the fact that there is more specialization; and a more general appreciation of the relation of psychology to pedagogy than there once was. In a general way the teacher is most successful who has the gift of getting at the individualities of his pupils in music or in anything else. There is of course a considerable variety of classes lumped under one head in the phrase "music teacher"—voice teachers, piano teachers, violin teachers, organ teachers, a few teachers of the less popular instruments and less heard of, but deeply important, harmony teachers who give the pupil a scientific knowledge of the art he expects to practice either as a profession or an accomplishment.

A complaint which has been made by critics for many decades is that many pedagogues teach the performance of musical pieces, without really teaching music and that if their hearts could be searched it would be found that too many of them have lost all interest in music under the pressure of teaching routine. From such teachers the pupil may acquire a good deal of technical craft but not artistic enthusiasm. In all the larger cities, intelligent teachers recognize the high grade concert as an ally, and recommend their pupils to save their pocket money for concert attendance, in order that they may be brought under the spell of some great artist and into association with the finest music beautifully interpreted. But there must be many instances where it is necessary for the teacher by his or her own enthusiasm to bring the pupil into realization of music as a living art-force.

LET us pause for a moment to consider what music really is. It is a language,—the most universal of all languages as had frequently been said. A foreigner who cannot speak a word of English sits down at the pianoforte and if he plays one of the works by the immortal composers the language he evokes is immediately understood by the musically-trained among his audience; and apprehended even by the musically untrained if they happen to have a feeling for the finer order of composition. In a more obvious expression everyone knows what a given musical utterance means. A military bugle call is clearer and more emphatic than speech. The most vulgar march or dance refrain at once embodies a human impulse, inspires an action in which everyone would like to participate. One writer going more fully into the language of music has said:

"It has its newspaper trivialities—barrel organs, theatre and resort orchestras, and strummings, here and there, that are at best but of ephemeral value. It has its magazine stories,—compositions of transient interest—and it has its great and enduring literature. There are those who speak the language as natives,—those who almost in infancy can play or sing in a way to bring despair to ordinary hard-working plodders—those who speak fluently but ignore the literature, and those who know well what has been said by the great authors in tones, but who have learned by translations (hearing others play or through mechanical players) and cannot themselves so much as order a musical dinner or crack a musical joke for lack of practice in articulation. And there are those who know music as Demosthenes knew Greek and Gladstone knew English."

Need it be said then, that musical education is the acquirement of a language with a superb and universal literature. The process of adapting natural materials capable of making musical sounds to human use has followed such lines during the past century and a half that the study of the piano has become one of the most important essentials in acquiring familiarity with this language. Owing to the adaptability of this wonderful contrivance to the rendering of all types of music it has assumed an enormously important relationship to the whole art, but it is a matter for complaint that scores of young people learn how to use the pianoforte mechanically without really acquiring a knowledge of musical literature. They are akin to the many who learn to read and yet have never developed the capacity for enjoying a good book; or, to choose a more sophisticated analogy, to the person who has acquired a smattering of French phrases without being able to enjoy a French play or make himself understood in conversation with a Frenchman. The neglect of music as a language and a literature by those who have been students of the art or think they have been is one of the evidences that in many instances the teaching of music as a mechanical craft has not been accompanied by real musical education at all. Take the phenomenon of musical trash; there is trash in all the arts, trashy writing and trashy pictures, but the singular fact is that musical trash often flourishes among those who have been supposedly trained in music, (which is not so of literature and pictures)—among people who have spent time, and labor, and money in learning how to produce musical tones and yet have somehow acquired no appreciation of their meanings and possibilities.

For many decades music, in all parts of North America, has suffered under the disability that all the arts in their finer aspects encounter in a democracy. In the past, music has flourished chiefly under the aristocratic system. The governing classes or the nobility deemed it proper to encourage music as a classic and to support it. The other classes followed suit, because it opened the way to favor. The person of obscure birth with a fine musical talent found in it a means of rising above his so-called caste. It may not have been an ideal system but it did bring about the creation of music of the higher order, and it militated against trash. But since on this continent, democracy has come to stay, we must devise some substitute for aristocratic support; and that can only be found in the creation of a large and widely diffused class who are interested in music in its higher aspects as a language and a literature, and which has acquired an intuitive distaste for trash. It must be the aim to teach music itself and not merely the mechanical exercises which go to the production of music.

One has spoken of a gradual growth of apprehension among the better order of teachers of the importance of psychology in relation to pedagogy; but it is admitted that a great deal remains to be accomplished in this direction, before every certificated music teacher and every graduate performer will also be an enthusiast with an æsthetic appreciation of music as an articulate art. It is a stock accusation that, for all the enormous aggregate of money put into the purchase of musical instruments and the acquirement of musical instruction, less return has been received in actual communal enthusiasm than from like expenditures in any other directions. Many remedies have been suggested, even to that of pauperizing the community by giving them free what they do not want to work and pay for. But the only remedy that seems to be really effective is that of reaching the individual through the understanding teacher who will impart music to his pupils in addition to the mere mechanical practice of the means of making music;—the awakening of taste in the beginner which will in time make him a spreader of the message. The encouraging sign for us in Canada that we have now so many instructors, native and imported, who are not merely pedagogues but real enthusiasts in their own particular lines. Twenty years ago the American essayist Henry G. Hanchett in discussing remedies said: "Not more professors, but more amateurs; not more concerts, but more intelligent interest in those we have; not more compositions, but more comprehensions; not more vocal culture, but more and larger choral societies; not more technique, but more interpretation." The new cult of Synthetic and Kindergarten music teachers are on the right track. The mechanical players have given a strong impulse in the right direction. The piano student who can play three hundred notes in a minute should not be set to increase the velocity to seven hundred, but be given application for his three hundred in portraying the beauties of thousands of compositions requiring no higher attainments. When he learns to appreciate and reveal all there is of meaning in such works, it will be time enough to enlarge his mechanical powers. And with appreciation and understanding of musical values, the training of technical means for expressing them will be easy and pleasant work."

Schools and colleges are beginning to appreciate the fact,—somewhat slowly perhaps,—that it is as much their cultural function to rouse in pupils an understanding love of music as a beautiful language, as it is to stimulate appreciation of good literature and good pictures. The task of turning out so many pupils who can play or sing or even compose in a rudimentary way, is infinitely less important than that of sending forth pupils who sympathetically understand music. The general quality of all communal music, religious, military, social, theatrical, concert, choral and so on depends on the breadth of refined musical sympathy that exists in the public at large; and it is the aim of all musical education of real importance and significance to increase and widen it. In the plastic arts conditions are reversed. There are thousands of people who can intelligently appreciate a good picture (artists to the contrary notwithstanding) for one who can paint one. But the contrary is true of music. In college life it ought be possible to spread a feeling for the art and an understanding of it, even among those who are not striving to qualify as executants in any particular branch. The creation not only of musicians but of music lovers, through making them acquainted with the higher achievements of the art, is the real way to make music assume its proper relation to the culture of the community.

The Turn of the Flood and seen him turn away. And yet he cares for me—some. He isn't all indifference to me—yet. Oh, it's awful, awful to see the thing that makes life worth living go before your eyes, and try to help it and yet have it ebb from you like the tide!"

It was very sad; it was also very amazing, for of all the unsatisfactory explanations of the discord between Luke and Ada that Elizabeth Allen had inspected and then discarded as inadequate, she had never suspected for a moment that Ada's abrupt exits, her tragic manners, were because she was attempting to keep Luke's love. She turned it all over in her mind.

"I am sure Luke loves you very dearly," was what she finally brought out.

"He's letting me go; he's letting me slide," Ada insisted, forlornly. Her eyes were dry now, but desolation was in every bend of her lovely body; even the folds of her dress seemed to take on their wearer's forsaken air. "He'd let me go alone, if I would; he'd let me go by myself—you saw that."

"It has sometimes seemed, my dear, that Luke would enjoy going out with you all the more if you sometimes did go out alone," Mrs. Allen ventured.

"You don't know how men swarm around a woman who's seen about without her husband," Ada replied, simply. "If I once got the reputation of being unhappy, that would be—the end."

They sat in silence for a while, each one brooding over her own thoughts, Mrs. Allen trying to understand in all its complications the society Ada had shown her—and shown her with such unconcern; one of Ada's most upsetting traits was her way of bringing out appalling things with the same tranquillity with which she might remark that the day was fine.

Presently Ada took up her plaint. "And Luke won't help me. Luke won't see! I feel as if we were both in some swift-rushing stream that was bearing us away. We might fight it together, but if we let go each other's hands, we'll be drowned. So I grab hold of him and cling to him, but—it's no use."

Mrs. Allen was not skilled in the use of metaphor; it occurred to her however that people who fought too hard against drowning, drowned all the more quickly. Ada looked at her mother-in-law, and what she saw in the delicate, distressed face touched her.

"You poor dear!" she cried. "I've worried you awfully; I'm a beast. But anyway, you've seen enough before this, and I love Luke—"

She stopped, then for a moment Mrs. Allen looked into Ada's heart and turned her eyes away ashamed, for in that moment she had seen how it was Ada loved Luke. It was a love which burned Ada and tortured her, an all-devouring flame that would give her no rest, nor could she in her turn give any peace to Luke.

It was soon after this that Mrs. Allen began to venture on timid words of counsel. When Luke broke out:

"She's got to stop these scenes, you know! I can't stand them; no man could!" Mrs. Allen answered, wistfully: "She loves you very dearly, Luke. All she wants is your affection."

"She's a queer way of showing it," he answered, with his weary bitterness. "Why don't she leave me alone sometimes? I love her too. I'm very fond of Ada; but a man's got to be left alone sometimes—and by God, I'm going to be! I won't stand it!"

And when Mrs. Allen suggested mildly to Ada after one of her volcanic explosions:

"Don't you think, my dear, that one should choose one's times and seasons with a busy man—"

"Oh, I'm not politic," Ada would answer, recklessly. "People in pain seldom are. It's when I'm hurt that I cry out. When you love people so terribly you can't be tactful."

There were two things that no one could dispute. One was that Ada did

WHAT a month of holiday delight is July! We used to look forward to it with such fond anticipation, for it brought the end of examinations and the picnics and camping, for which we had been planning for months and months.

It was truly a glad and glorious month, which went on wings, and left us with memories of golden days. Even when there came a heat wave and the appetite failed for every dish save ice cream—pineapple flavor preferred—we managed to feel friendly towards July. It might melt us and leave us quite exhausted; but we remembered its golden sunshine and brilliant pconies, with a warmth of gratitude.

There are souvenirs of July, however, which are not to be regarded with benevolence. Such are too many freckles, an over-supply of tan and a sunburn which goes too deep. Our "foremothers" were wiser than we, in the matter of headwear. They wore wide-brimmed hats which shielded eyes and complexion from the sun. There was the ever-useful sun-bonnet which was a boon on a scorching day and which was a picturesque spot in the garden as it bobbed along in pink or lilac or forget-me-not blue. Then there was the sunshade—the use of which grandmother appreciated. Sometimes it was called a mere parasol—and a dainty affair it was with its ivory-or-gilt-tipped ribs. There was the dowager's parasol, which was a rather awful affair of black satin, with frill of Spanish lace. It was regarded with deep respect and even with envy, as if it were a semi-royal belonging.

For years, Dame Fashion has decreed the small hat, even for the summer months, and the consequence is that the feminine complexion has suffered greatly. The Tam o' Shanter, adopted from a Scottish cap which was not intended for wear in a Canadian summer, may be all that is picturesque, crowning hair that is brown or golden or auburn, but it is not a protection against sunburn. The summer girl who insists on wearing it would be wise to wait until the shades of evening are falling before putting it on her bonny locks for an after-supper trip in the canoe.

It must be borne in mind that sunburn can be a real "burn" which will leave a genuine scar. Many a girl who has thought it savored of "real sport," to accumulate as much tan and sunburn as she can possibly acquire, has had reason to regret her carelessness, as the extra burn does not disappear in a week or two. Wherefore, please remember, if you wish to look well when the autumn dances come, that an ounce of preventive cream or lotion is worth a pound of cure.

Do not put cream thickly on the face if you are going out in the strong sunlight, as the extra cream merely attracts the heating rays and a painful sensation is the result. An almond lotion or cream is the best kind of application before facing the heat of July, but it should be rubbed into the skin very thoroughly.

Keeping a Child's Hair Beautiful

What a Mother Can Do To Keep Her Child's Hair Healthy—Fine, Soft and Silky—Bright, Fresh-Looking and Luxuriant

THE beauty of your child's hair depends upon the care you give it. Shampooing it properly is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes the hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your child's hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because the hair has not been shampooed properly.

When the hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh-looking, soft and silky.

While children's hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why discriminating mothers, everywhere, now use Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This clear, pure, and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your child's hair look, just follow this simple method:

A SIMPLE, EASY METHOD

FIRST, put two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water. Then wet the hair and scalp with clear warm water. Pour the Mulsified evenly over the hair and rub it thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length, down to the ends of the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly—always using clear, fresh, warm water.

Then use another application of Mulsified, again working up a lather and rubbing it in briskly as before.

You can easily tell when the hair is perfectly clean, for it will be soft and silky in the water, the strands will fall apart easily, each separate hair floating alone in the water, and the entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

RINSE THE HAIR THOROUGHLY

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water.

When you have rinsed the hair thoroughly, wring it as dry as you can; finish by rubbing it with a towel, shaking it and fluffing it until it is dry. Then give it a good brushing.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want your child to always be remembered for its beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage—and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months. Beware of imitations—be sure you get Mulsified. Look for the name Watkins on the package.

TEACH YOUR BOY TO SHAMPOO HIS HAIR REGULARLY

IT may be hard to get a boy to shampoo his hair regularly, but it's mighty important that he does so.

Get your boy in the habit of shampooing his hair regularly once each week. A boy's hair being short, it will only take a few minutes' time. Simply moisten the hair with warm water, pour on a little Mulsified and rub it in vigorously with the tips of the fingers. This will stimulate the scalp, make an abundance of rich, creamy lather and cleanse the hair thoroughly. It takes only a few seconds to rinse the lather all out when he is through.

You will be surprised how this regular weekly shampooing with Mulsified will improve the appearance of his hair, and you will be teaching your boy a habit he will appreciate in after-life, for a luxuriant head of hair is something every man feels mighty proud of.

Then a dusting of powder leaves the face in an attractive condition for an afternoon of summer enjoyment. Someone has written to know about a powder tinted burnt orange. Frankly, I admit that I have seen no such powder and should be rather afraid of it if I beheld it. A burnt orange powder sounds very much like the Twelfth of July, and I fear that it might explode. There is a burnt orange "rouge" (it sounds contradictory or redundant to say those two words together) which is quite effective when used as a mere dab by a brunette. However, just a little powder is all that is needed, even on a very warm day;—and do not use a highly-scented kind. Just the faintest odor of violet is what a great many prefer, but there are others which are also found "appealing." I know a girl who rejoices in what she calls "simple scents" and who was delighted when she discovered a powder with just the most refreshing suggestion of geranium.

The present generation may be too much given to the use of powder, but it must be remembered that powder has its cleanly and healing purposes, as well as its softening effect on the skin. Perhaps you have not forgotten the extreme heat of last July, when, for three torrid weeks, we "frizzled," whether we lived in country or city. A nurse told me that she had charge, during those weeks, of a patient who was in a very weak condition, following an attack of typhoid fever.

"I was so anxious about her every evening,"—but she says "that extra bath of talcum brought her through the heated spell."

"Talcum!" I echoed, thinking of clay-baths and a "mud plunge" of which I had heard.

"Yes, After I had given her the ordinary sponge bath, I just deluged her with talcum powder and—you have no idea how cooling the effect was. Of course, I used up a good deal of talcum powder, but it was fine treatment for hot weather."

Some of you may find during the coming month, the cooling quality of a talcum bath.

THE LETTER BOX

CANADIAN GIRL. I have sent you a hair tonic prescription, as you requested, but, really, you must get rid of that encroaching dandruff before you can hope for luxuriant hair. Dandruff is a sworn enemy to a "handsome head of hair," and you cannot retain beautiful and lustrous tresses, if dandruff is going to remain on the scalp. So, devote yourself for a time to getting rid of this intruding scurf, and you will find the result quite worth the trouble of treatment. Diet has something to do with the dandruff, and you are probably not eating enough vegetables and fruit. Most of us eat far too much "heavy" food, which does not mean real nourishment. However, I didn't intend to talk the "everlasting lettuce"—which is as good as carrots for your skin or your hair.

BLUEBELL. So, you are a genuine "Down Easter," with a home in one of the most beautiful spots of picturesque Nova Scotia. You should be called a Bluenose, then, as a true Eastern aristocrat. From what I have seen of the girls of Nova Scotia, I should say that they need no aid to a complexion of cream-and-roses. In no other part of Canada, have I seen such clear and radiant faces as in this province of cherries and sunshine. Of course, the city of St. John is unkind enough to say that Halifax is a city of mists, but the mists only make the complexion more soft and glowing. In fact, I daresay you have to thank the sea air for that dewy aspect of the skin which is known only to dwellers near the ocean. I have sent the advice asked for, in connection with the hair tonic, and I trust you will ere long have radiant and abundant locks. Good luck to you, Bluebell, blooming in the East.

A Home of Her Own

By Gertrude Russell Lewis

THE district school-teacher, sweet and intelligent, had married the farmer's son. Her hours were lengthened from six to sixteen and her modest stipend stopped. But she was congratulated: "For now you have a home of your own," they said. She smiled happily. "Then my Delft room will come true," she responded. They were well to do. The land came by inheritance; the farming equipment was of the best. But in the house she found that the old way prevailed, and while her wishes were not denied, they were simply unfulfilled; they were unimportant. And first the tastes were dropped, and then the desires and, too often, the needs repressed.

The work grew heavier, no labor-saving device was wanting for the men, but their time meant money; hers meant only love. And the agricultural journals that phrased the bucolic mind and advertised quite eighty columns of most elaborate and expensive machinery for the ten-hour men without the house, gave her but a scanty woman's page, not of expenditures for her comfort, but of makeshifts for her economies. Even the new cream separator meant not an advantage to her, but the withdrawal of the butter money to her husband's purse.

And the parlor carpet was yet to buy. Five years had toiled away and the blue and white parlor, painted and papered by her own hands, with painful care, draped, but as yet ragged, waited.

Rugs elsewhere, yes, but not in one's parlor on a prosperous farm, if only for the neighbors' pride. She was reduced to argument: "The Dorcas Band meet here next time."

Then the man came in. "I am going to town—give me your money and I will get the carpet." They were not even to choose it together. She returned with the original pieces, here and there a silver dollar, hardly a paper bill in the roll, and handed them to him. "Remember the color, Henry," wistfully, "and if you cannot get blue, do not get a red one, even if we wait until fall. My Delft plate hangs there you know."

He came in late but jubilant. "I got a bargain Smythe could not sell. The color isn't good, he says, but it will wear forever. I saved five dollars on it toward the binder."

The carpet which she had to sew was red and green. The Dorcas Band met with them in their turn. Her successor, the young school teacher, was present with a shy new look of interest in domestic themes. "It must be sweet to have a home of your own," she said.

For the Midsummer Wardrobe

BY CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

WHILE skirts remain short, hosiery will be of supreme sartorial importance. No woman who wishes to appear well dressed can afford to ignore this fact. She must select her hosiery with as much care as her gloves or her chapeau, and if she knows just how to go about it, the rest is easy, for never before has there been as great a variety of styles and colors to choose from as there is this year. The fact is, that if you want to be right in the fashion, you must have a pair of hose to match every costume or a pleasing contrast. For instance; if you happen to have an orchid homespun, you should have a pair of silk or silk and wool "homespun" mixture stockings. There are about thirty different color mixtures in this style of stocking and they are the very newest offering for sports wear.

If your costume happens to be a compose of dent de leon and white, why, the prescription for a chic outfit is black patent leather pumps, dent de leon plain silk hosiery, white skirt and coat the same shade as your hosiery.

For an all-white flannel or ratine suit, there is a very fine quality of white cashmere with clocking up the sides, or there is white silk. A very nice heavy weight stocking comes in fibre silk and is ribbed, but as a rule the real silk or silk and wool is preferred to fibre which has less elasticity than the others. Ribbed and drop stitch hosiery are very smart and for evening wear there is the gauzy quality. Beige Hosiery is one of the pleasing contrasts one frequently meets.

The vogue of rolled down tops has not received much recognition in Canada so far as we can find out. That is, the stores are not featuring any special stocking for this purpose unless it be a silk with a Shirred garter top. Of course there are nice-looking ribbed cashmere and silk mixtures that can be worn this way, if the wearer wishes.

One of the things the Canadian manufacturer specializes in is hosiery with elastic tops, that is a stitch that is very flexible, and is gradually superseding the ribbed top which is likely to stretch too much. He also makes a splendid fitting extra large sized stocking, which is neat in the ankle and has a slender foot. This is an achievement, for every woman requiring these large sizes remembers how loose and baggy the old-time large stocking was and will gladly give its successor a trial.

Gigantic strides have been made in the manufacture of hosiery by Canadian mills in the last seven or eight years. Thousands of dollars have been spent in new machinery that fashions the leg and foot, so that no longer is the accusation true that Canadian-made hosiery fits badly. Speaking of this to-day, the hosiery buyer for one of the largest department stores in Canada said in effect that nowhere in the world was better fitting and wearing hosiery made than in Canada. He had bought from everywhere, and was satisfied that the Canadian mills had no peer. This was a tribute indeed.

Just a word about what is sometimes sold as "seconds." Very often one can get excellent values which are advertised as "seconds," and the saleswoman will explain that there is some slight defect which will not affect the wear at all. This is very likely true, for very often the defect is just a slightly thin spot in the leg, in the hem or perhaps even in the foot, which can be skillfully darned and the stocking is just as good as a perfect one, which will cost twenty-five or fifty per cent. more. When hosiery is made and finished up, it is carefully examined before packing, and if there is the slightest flaw to be found, the stocking is thrown out, in time all the discards are gathered together and sold to some buyer on the look-out for special priced goods, at a greatly reduced price.

ALL one needs to rise above the mediocre in clothes this season is a little bit of native genius and a little bit of time to think about the matter. The rest is easy, for Fashion is utilizing everything from plain unbleached cotton to the sheerest and most expensive imported textiles, and there's not a color that isn't fashionable, although of course there are some that claim to be more fashionable than others. We think we mentioned in a previous letter that white would be worn by very discriminating women this summer, and this forecast was fully substantiated at the Woodbine Races in May when Toronto's elite turned out to see the contest for the King's Plate and on succeeding days. Some of the most elegantly dressed women present wore white costumes. So white it is, but not exclusively. All the bright yellows, greens, blues, mauves and reds of which we talked and wrote in early spring have materialized and seen en masse against the green of the turf, resembled nothing so much as a garden of gorgeous flowers.

But by the time you read this, your summer wardrobe will have been almost if not quite completed, and perhaps packed in the steamer trunk or the nice shiny black suit case, with a tray for your blouses and pockets in the lid for your handkerchiefs, gloves and other small articles, while a hat box awaits an assortment of hats such as no wardrobe ever before contained, for this summer's hats have a way of their own, and without a hat box, we fear ruin awaits them in transit. Still a few suggestions may be acceptable.

The porch dress has been relegated a very important role—that of looking cool, bright and fresh, and it may be made of gingham, chintz, cotton trimmed with chintz or gingham, of organdie, dotted Swiss—in fact anything that your taste suggests, but it must be made up smartly and trimmed prettily, to distinguish it from the more homely, though very necessary, house dress. If the objective is a summer cottage or camp, a festive looking chintz apron will not come amiss, and will be found not only attractive but useful. For garments such as these, Fashion is very prodigal of color and splashes it around everywhere this season.

The past month has found eponge coming to the front as a material for sports skirts. Everyone knows the spongy texture of this material, which is pretty enough in plain colors, but doubly so when woven in stripes of various colors and topped with a slip-on sweater of alpaca to match the dominant color, and just to complete the picture, a tipsy little sports hat of the same color.

There's a daintiness about sports costumes this season that one does not usually attach to anything with so strenuous a sounding name. To illustrate: with sports skirt, sweater and sports hat, there is the ultra-feminine lingerie collar and cuff sets, which started the season by being very plain but are resolving themselves into rather frilly things. There are soft, pretty frilly fronted guimpes and vestees, or camivests we have heard them called, meaning we suppose a combination vestee and camisole, for as perhaps you know, some of the new camisoles have been trimmed up so that they can be worn as a vestee or "front" in vest or tuxedo coat. The heavier materials used for vests and sweater sets earlier in the season are giving place to the more delicate materials such as organdie and dotted Swiss muslin. And although as the warmer weather approaches, the cooler looking white accessories are taking the place of the strong colors worn earlier, we cannot ignore the charm of the pale blue, light green, canary, periwinkle or rose insets in some of the new pieces that the shops are showing.

Short sleeves have made the glove an important consideration. There are many summer frocks with long sleeves; still we shall see more short ones during July and August than long ones, and while, no matter how cheerfully we discard gloves on most occasions, there are times when we simply must wear them, if only for "looks' sake." But we may compromise if we wish, and wear lace mitts. It is long enough since they went out of fashion to classify them as " quaint," and indeed they do look quaint, although when one sees them in all the season's colors to match the costume, they do seem to fit into the scheme of things modern.

THE sunshade is another revival. With the advent of the automobile, the sunshade disappeared. Women-kind had enough to do to keep their chapeaux on while they were getting used to flying along the road in a "horseless" carriage, without trying to retain their grip on a sunshade, so they discarded it. Besides, no matter how carefully it was stowed away in the car, someone was sure to sit down on it or stumble against it and break the handle. For a time the umbrella makers tried to bridge the gap between a sunshade and an umbrella by giving us the latter with blue, green, purple, red or brown covers, but these no longer satisfy. We carry a red or purple umbrella on a wet day to brighten up the landscape, but for sunshine, we crave a sunshade, whether it be of chintz, gingham, printed silk or a fanciful affair of crepe de Chine or taffeta and lace.

The large, floppy-brimmed hats of rough, loosely-woven straw timbo or even a leghorn, wreathed with wild flowers, are both practical and summery. They are to be had in sand shades which are considered very modish and also in all kinds of bright colors, even a bright poppy red, no matter if it does look hot for midsummer. These shapes are sometimes used as a foundation for a silk crown or a leaf covering of georgette with long ostrich plumes dripping from the side in cavalier fashion. An all-white hat of this description looks very elegant.

For sports wear, the felt hat is very nice and decidedly fashionable. Traditions don't count for much where modern fashions are concerned. We used to think it a terrible disgrace if circumstances compelled us to wear our felt chapeaux any later than Easter Sunday, and now we wear them all summer. Most of these felt hats have rolling brims and are usually in the light colors such as grey, mauve, white and light jade.

Those Utilitarian Rooms

attain nor difficult to maintain. Nevertheless, both judicious foresight and constant oversight are required.

* * *

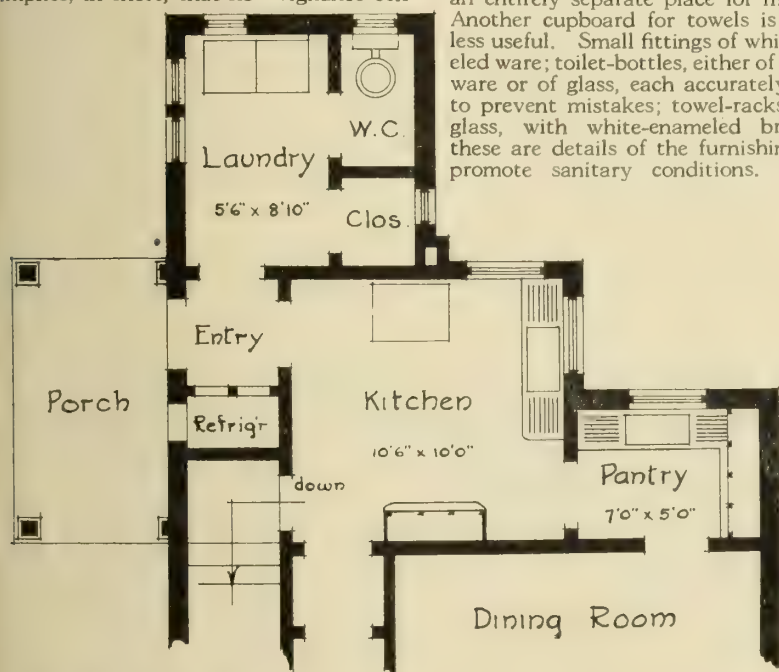

FORESIGHT is more important than some people appear to realize. Thus, very frequently, homes are under actual construction before any decision has been reached in regard to the bathroom fixtures: which sometimes means that, in the end, space cannot be found for certain especially desirable types of fixture. Oversight—to maintain cleanliness in a bathroom—is very vital, of course; but foresight in choosing fixtures of an "easy to clean" style is still more important. Fortunately, the open plumbing now in general use is eminently satisfactory, because it is very easy to keep clean; thanks to modern excellence in material and design. Foresight must, however, be exercised in its location, lest some dust-collecting pockets be created.

As for the actual oversight—that involves much more than a cursory visitation of broom and duster: it means that the fixtures must be kept in perfect working order, that all painted surfaces be carefully gone over as frequently as necessary, that the bathroom be religiously aired in winter as well as in summer. It implies, in short, that no vigilance con-tion is preferable to one of wood; and a baseboard of any of these materials is superior to the ordinary wooden base. If, however, for any reason, a wood-floor be decided upon, it should be entirely covered with linoleum or cork.

In treating the walls of a bathroom, a high wainscot of tile or cement is a splendid beginning; although not always a feasible undertaking in a house of modest cost. There are, too, various patented materials now on the market which are guaranteed by their makers to be excellent substitutes for tile. These are available either for the covering of the entire wall or for use as a dado around the bathroom. But, after all, paint seems to be the logical wall-finish for a bathroom. It is easily cleaned and just as easily renewed. It is also adapted to changes in the color-scheme—and in every room of every house an occasional complete change in coloring is very desirable, because of its indisputable psychological effect upon the occupants. Whatever colors may be chosen for the walls in these successive schemes, it is surely scarcely necessary to emphasize the desirability of very light tones or all-white in the bathroom.

No bathroom is complete without a small cupboard for toilet-articles and home-remedies. It is, indeed, better still to have two cupboards, in order to provide an entirely separate place for medicines. Another cupboard for towels is scarcely less useful. Small fittings of white enameled ware; toilet-bottles, either of the same ware or of glass, each accurately labeled to prevent mistakes; towel-racks of opal glass, with white-enameled brackets—these are details of the furnishing which promote sanitary conditions. Lighting

In the service department of a small house shown in this plan, there is apparent a most gratifying attention to all the details which make for ease in household endeavor. In the pantry, for instance, the sink is admirably lighted by a small window and its relation to the built in cupboards at the right leaves little to be desired. Windows upon two sides flood the adjoining kitchen with light and air, and glass in the doors leading to the entry and thence to the rear porch assure additional light. The refrigerator is located in the entry, in order that it may be iced conveniently from the porch. Although the laundry is small in area, it is entirely practicable. Light enters it from two sides and a roomy closet gives ample storage facilities for all the paraphernalia of the weekly washday.

tributory to the perfect sanitary upkeep of this important room be even for a day relaxed. Remember always that the equipment and proper maintenance of a bathroom have more than a little to do with the health of any household.

The attention required to maintain bathroom cleanliness should, however, not be unnecessarily added to by care expended in cleaning useless space. Of course, in a home where several servants are employed, there is no particular objection to the bathrooms being rather large; but, in the house of moderate size, nothing is gained by having a bathroom one square foot larger in area than is actually essential. Moreover, if properly planned as to wall-openings and general contour to create advantageous locations for the necessary equipment, a thoroughly satisfactory bathroom can be evolved within surprisingly small space.

As an aid to cleanliness, it is desirable to reduce the amount of exposed wood-work to the very minimum. For that reason, a floor of tile, cement or composi-fixtures of white enamel are also appropriate for the bathroom.

The use of window-curtains in a bathroom is suitable only when the chosen material can be tubbed frequently and satisfactorily. Dotted Swiss, marquise and scrim come under this heading, as they are all very durable. Rugs should also be selected with their washable qualities in mind—and that points to the advantages of the familiar and ever-popular rag rugs, which can be washed times without number. For the bathing-hour, however, nothing is better than one of the soft, thick bath-mats made of toweling.

The bathroom, the laundry and the pantry—the three rooms are undoubtedly utilitarian in their purpose. Without detracting in the least from their usefulness, let us also endow them with that beauty which lies in interesting color and form, in comfortable convenience and perfect sanitation: for, in so doing, it is certain that our homes will be infinitely better places to live in and enjoy.

I never dreamed it was so easy —

ELECTRICITY IN DOMESTIC SERVICE

WHERE is the "faithful family servant" of yester-year? Where is the Mary Ann who did almost everything for the family, from blacking the boots to whitening the silver? Some of our readers will recall a "Maggie" or a "Susie" or a "Rose," who, in far-off years, did the family washing and ironing, cooked the meals, swept the floors and cleaned the front steps every morning—for eight or nine dollars a month—and considered herself lucky if she had one night "off" in the week—She was sometimes called a "treasure" and instances were known where she remained with the family until the children grew up. Mary Ann is disappearing—we can almost see the last flutter of her skirt—and the time is coming when, in our cities, cooks, housemaids or parlormaid will be engaged by the hour or the day and will be found highly useful, if not so unlimited in time and toil as the "general servant" of long ago.

In fact, the overwhelming majority of Canadian housewives have no useful maid-of-all-work in their homes, and yet seem to manage the household with efficiency. There is a helper near at hand which must not be ignored, in considering modern domestic emergencies. When the housewife of to-day is in doubt or distress, she presses the button and electricity does the rest.

An ancient newspaper joke which used to be highly popular concerned itself with the tribulations of the husband as he lighted the fire in the morning. Getting the breakfast used to be a sad and serious business, especially on a winter morning, and it was no wonder that breakfast meant the most quarrelsome meal of the day. In the towns and cities of the present, all we have to do is to turn on the electricity and the bacon, toast and coffee will soon be all that our early-morning appetite craves. The small electric stove is equal to many demands, and, when you can command its services, you will find them a clean and prompt substitute for Mary Ann. If you have a "little electric" and the power behaves properly—as it usually does—you may indulge in a feeling of superiority as you think of the struggles of our pioneer forefathers over the morning fire. Of course, it really is not to our credit that we have a little electric domestic servant in our home. Someone else did the thinking for us long ago, and many wise heads put themselves together and a toiling band of Sons of Martha worked for weary hours over wires and connections, in order that we might press that convenient button, turn the electric force in the direction of our kitchen and enjoy a little morning toast and coffee, to say nothing of the poached egg.

* * *

DO you remember the old-fashioned ironing day, when women toiled in July heat over a fierce fire, in order that towels, sheets, shirts and waists might be duly pressed? Women dreaded the ironing day during the summer—and with excellent reason. One pair of hands was hardly equal to the task, and Mary Ann usually found much assistance at the ironing board. With an electric successor to Mary Ann, cool and competent and always at hand, ironing day has been robbed of most of its terrors. In fact, there is a genuine pleasure in the use of the smooth swift servant which responds so quickly to a touch of that magic button. The electric iron has made the world an easier place to work in and has made what used to be a toil almost a pastime. Think of how easy it is to "launder" one's daintiest blouses and collars and cuffs, to say nothing of our favorite bits of French lingerie which we should hate to trust to any laundry. They are like the china cups we fancy most—things to have our personal care and cleaning. With the electric iron, we can have them all "done up" in half-an-hour or less, and no heat to make the operation a real undertaking.

I do not believe that the modern woman ever uses the electric iron without thanking her lucky stars that she does not have the old-fashioned fire to keep up, and the irons to renew.

As for the laundry, electricity is simply awaking every activity to life in the cleansing of our garments. It is all very well to talk of the "good old times" and their simplicity. The wash-day of the far-off years was the saddest in the week. It meant a smell of suds and hash for dinner—with bread pudding or something equally uninteresting for dessert. With the best intentions in the world, the housekeeper of the nineteenth century found it impossible to keep the odors of wash day from invading all quarters.

Behold the modern washing-machine, controlled by electric force and producing all the hot water required, without any of the discomforts of heat in the kitchen or the laundry! It has been made beautiful, too, this latest and best boon which electricity has brought into domestic service. Gone are the toils of the erstwhile Martha-by-the-Day, for the up-to-date machine for making soiled clothes spotless is managed as easily as turning on the light.

EVER since woman began to keep house, she has regarded "dust" as her sworn foe. Long before we had street cleaners or garbage collectors, or before the doctors had begun to tell us about germs and their hiding-places, the good house-keeper regarded dust with positive aversion. The history of the duster has more than a passing interest, for it shows humanity in a constant conflict with a foe which, at times, seems invisible.

"Where does all the dust come from?" has been the wearied inquiry of thousands of housewives, who cannot understand why the pursuit of the dust demon is unending. The leaves and branches of trees were first used to scatter the dust, then the feathers and wings of birds were brought into domestic service, and finally the corn broom arrived. None of these, however, proved sufficiently rapid in execution for modern tastes, and the sweeper made its appearance, with a certain directness of method which issued a decree against dust. Satisfactory as the sweeper proved, in many respects, there was something more dust-destroying which only electricity could bring to pass. There came the vacuum cleaner and the housewife, sceptical at first of this capacious bag, with its rod accompaniments, soon became enthusiastic over the results. The whine of the vacuum cleaner, as it sucked the dust out of the rugs and off the walls, meant a song of triumph, for dust was disappearing as it never had before, and the cleaning day was no longer a burden. Sweeping and dusting, the dual process by which the dust had been banished, appeared now to be clumsy and burdensome. Electricity has come in to do its magic work and, all of a sudden, the house-keeping world wonders why it has toiled for all these years when a few sparks of electricity were waiting to do the work.

A modern scientist has assured us that, before very long, we shall be able to secure electricity for ourselves—snatch it out of thin air. This sounds fairy-like, but we who have seen the electric railways arrive and have heard the radio concerts should be willing to listen to the prophets. Electricity is doing the washing and the ironing, cooking the food, sweeping the floors and flooding our towns and cities with light. It gives us comfort all day, from the morning coffee to the midnight glimmer of the latest "electricity turned down" which keeps a glow for the invalid. We are losing or have lost Mary Ann—but electricity is a noiseless and effective maid-of-all-work, who has the best of references and does not require "a night off."

Concerning One Problem of the New Home-Maker

BY FRANCES M. McNALLY

THE month of June brought the usual number of Canadian brides and now, from shore to shore of our fair Dominion, hundreds of young women are beginning to cope with the complex and varied problems of home making.

Of the three necessities of life, which the home must provide, food, clothing and shelter, food is the most important. Efficient living depends on health, and good health depends tremendously on food—what we eat and how much. The welfare of the family, therefore, both will build up the body and repair any worn out parts; second, some foods which will supply plenty of energy to do the day's work; and third, foods which will keep the entire system in good working order and the body growing normally.

Selecting food to provide these essentials. The number of food materials available to-day is very great and is constantly increasing and it is quite bewildering to choose amidst such a wealth of materials, everyone of which may contribute something to the wholesomeness and attractiveness of the diet. The selection becomes physical and spiritual is largely in the hands of the one who provides three meals a day. Is it any wonder that the new homemaker feels that feeding the family, efficiently, is her most perplexing problem? "Happy is he who sits down to the dinner provided for him, without thought of what he must leave out, with a mind free for social pleasure, secure in the skill and knowledge of his cook."

Much has been written about food values and the scientific planning of meals. Unfortunately though, a great deal of the information that has been much simpler when we know that most, if not all, of the foods in common use, may be classified into five groups according to their composition and uses.

GROUP 1. VEGETABLES AND FRUITS

We depend on this group for flavour, bulk, mineral substances, especially iron, and for vitamins. The mineral substances provide material for body growth and repair; and the bulk, minerals and vitamins help to keep the system in good working order. At least three kinds offered, has not simplified the homemaker's problem but has added to it. Many an earnest seeker after knowledge has become weary and discouraged in computing calories and trying to adjust the protein and energy intake to the needs of the members of her family. This is not necessary. Satisfactory nutrition can be obtained, without solution each day of scientific problems but by keeping in mind a few simple underlying principles.

A Balanced or Correct Diet must include in the meals of each day three essentials. First, it must include some foods which of vitamins, called A, B and C are now considered necessary for normal growth and for the continued well being of adults. Their chief value probably lies in the increased resistance to disease which they give to the body. For this reason foods which are rich in vitamins are known as protective foods. Spinach is one of the most valuable foods in this group because of its exceptionally large percentage of iron as well as its richness in vitamins. All of the green leaf vegetables commonly used for salads and greens are especially useful in supply-

Frozen Desserts for Hot Summer Days

BY FRANCES M. McNALLY

The frozen dessert, popular at all times, becomes almost indispensable in the Summer. Though we often think of it as a luxury it is a real food. Ice cream, parfaits and mousses are most attractive forms in which to serve milk and cream and the water-ices and sherbets have for their foundation fruit juices, one of our best sources of minerals and vitamins. They, therefore, have a valuable health value in the diet. They are practical too, for they can be made and left to ripen some hours before serving. The commercial ice-cream business has reached enormous proportions, and the tendency seems to be growing to avoid the trouble of freezing it at home by purchasing it from a dealer. When ice cream is purchased, care should be taken to patronize the best manufacturers. It is a mistake, however, to think that making frozen desserts at home is a troublesome task. With a good freezer, a burlap bag, wooden mallet, and sufficient ice and rock salt, the process becomes easy and takes a surprisingly short time. Home preparation assures the best ingredients and a much greater variety.

Directions for freezing

The essentials in freezing are to have the ice finely crushed, to use the right proportion of coarse rock salt and to beat the mixture thoroughly, during the freezing. The proportions of ice and salt depends upon the texture desired; the larger the proportion of ice, the slower will be the freezing process and the smoother and finer-grained will be the frozen product. The following proportions have been found satisfactory: for ice-creams and sherbets one part salt to three parts ice, for water ices one part salt to two parts ice, for mousses and parfaits equal parts of ice and salt. Place the ice in burlap bag and crush finely with mallet. Scald the can, the dasher and lid. Put the mixture into the can and place the can in the wooden tub, cover, and adjust top. Turn the crank to make sure that the can fits in the socket. The ice and salt may be packed in the tub in layers; a more satisfactory way, however, is to mix the salt and crushed ice (in the desired proportions,) in a box, before packing around the can. By this method the salt begins to act immediately upon the ice and the temperature of this melting mixture, by the time you are ready to turn the crank, is much colder than when packed in layers. Cover the can completely with the ice and salt and keep it so, during the freezing. When the mixture is frozen, remove the dasher and pack the mixture down closely in the can. Put a cork in the opening of the cover and lay the gear-frame over, to keep the can down in the ice. Cover with a piece of old carpet or burlap.

Water Ices. The simplest form of frozen dessert is the water ice. It is simply fruit juice, sweetened, diluted with water and frozen. It is better to boil the sugar and water and add it to the fruit juice, as an uncooked ice lacks body and melts rapidly when exposed to the air.

Lemon Water Ice. Four lemons, one quart water, one orange, one and one-quarter pounds sugar. Put water and sugar on to boil. Grate the rind of one lemon and orange and add to the syrup. Boil five minutes and stand away to cool. Add the juice of lemons and orange, strain and freeze.

Orange Water Ice. Twelve oranges, one pound sugar, one quart water. Make the same as lemon ice.

Pineapple Water Ice. Two pineapples, one and one-half pounds of sugar, one quart water, juice two lemons. Pare and grate pineapples and add the juice from lemons. Follow directions for lemon ice.

Sherbets are made the same as water ices except that gelatine or stiffly-beaten egg white is added. The egg white is added when mixture is partly frozen.

Strawberry Sherbet. One quart strawberries, one pound sugar, one quart water, juice two lemons, one egg white. Boil the sugar and water together five minutes. Add the lemon juice to the strawberries and mash them. When syrup is cold, pour it over the berries and strain. When partly frozen add the stiffly beaten egg-white. Finish freezing.

Orange Sherbet. One tablespoon gelatine, one pint cold water, one cup sugar, two cups orange juice, one-half cup boiling water. Soak the gelatine in one-half cup cold water ten minutes. Make a syrup of the sugar and the remainder of the water. When cold add the orange juice. Dissolve gelatine in boiling water and add to the mixture. Strain and freeze.

Ice Creams are of two classes, those consisting entirely of sweetened and flavored cream and those with a custard foundation. The first is a product of American invention and is known as Philadelphia ice-cream, the second goes by the name of Neapolitan. The Neapolitan method is considered best adapted to coffee, chocolate, caramel and the various nut creams, and the Philadelphia for the various fruit creams,—strawberry, peach, pineapple, etc.

Vanilla Ice Cream (Philadelphia). One quart thin cream, three-quarters cup sugar, one and one-half tablespoons vanilla. Scald the cream, add the sugar and, when cold, the vanilla. Freeze.

Vanilla Ice Cream (Neapolitan). Two cups milk, one cup sugar, two eggs, one-eighth teaspoon salt, one quart thin cream, two tablespoons vanilla. Scald the milk. Beat the eggs slightly and add sugar and salt. Pour over this mixture the scalded milk. Cook over hot water twenty minutes stirring constantly at first. When cool add cream and flavoring; strain and freeze.

Pineapple Ice Cream. Three pints cream, one-half cup sugar, one can grated pineapple. Scald cream. When cool add the pineapple, let stand thirty minutes add sugar and freeze.

Nougat Ice Cream. Three cups milk, one cup sugar, yolks five eggs, one teaspoon salt, one and one-half cups heavy cream, whites five eggs, one-third cup each, filbert, walnut and almond meats, one teaspoon almond extract, one tablespoon vanilla. Make a custard of the first four ingredients, strain and cool. Add heavy cream, beaten until stiff, whites of eggs stiffly beaten, nuts finely chopped and flavouring. Freeze.

Caramel Ice Cream. One quart milk, one cup sugar, one-eighth teaspoon salt, six eggs. Put half of the sugar in a saucepan over the fire and stir until melted and dark brown. Add one-half cup of boiling water and simmer ten minutes. Make a custard of the other ingredients and add enough of the caramel to give the desired colour and flavour. Four ounces of melted sweet chocolate may be used instead of the caramel. For coffee ice-cream substitute strong coffee for caramel.

Macaroon Ice Cream. One quart cream, one cup macaroons, three-quarters cup sugar, one tablespoon vanilla. Dry and pound macaroons (measure after pounding.) Scald the cream, add the sugar, macaroons and vanilla and freeze.

Variations. Any plain ice-cream may be varied by serving with whipped cream, with fresh fruit or nuts or with a sauce. Many sauces are served warm and stiffen when poured over the cream. Nuts may be sprinkled on top of the sauce or candied fruit may be used in a sauce, especially with vanilla ice-cream.

Butterscotch Sauce. One and one-quarter cups brown sugar, two-thirds cup corn syrup, four tablespoons butter.

love her husband "terribly," as she said, and the other was that she suffered; she didn't make scenes out of sheer unreasonable wantonness. Rather, they were wrung from her by her pain, and deep in Elizabeth Allen a responsive chord stirred. She remembered how long ago her husband failed her, how the rainbow colored dreams she had dreamed as a young woman turned to gray. She had made her own timid, ineffectual attempts to make her dreams come true; after a while she had stopped dreaming, and had given her dreams to her son instead, and had waked up one morning a sedate married woman, happy as another. But Ada had no one else on whom to spend her affection, no one to think of but Luke.

Elizabeth Allen watched them, an agonized spectator of the battle, but while they had days when they harked back to their first happiness, Mrs. Allen watched for the storm. And the storm never with me. You see, I've quite tired him out," she explained—there was no bitterness in her tone, only grief—"So I give up, too; but always, whatever happens, remember I stayed by him till he turned me out."

"What do you suppose will happen?" Mrs. Allen quavered.

"I don't know," Ada returned, her tragic eyes fixed on vacancy. Then she rose and kissed her mother-in-law.

"I'll do my best," she said. "I'll do my very best—for your sake as well as Luke's. You're an angel. There are lots of women in your position who would blame me."

Poor Elizabeth Allen was not seeking to place blame. Disaster of some sort threatened, and her mind was busy as to how this might be averted, busy in wondering what it was that was happening to Ada, who since the night Luke had "taken his stand" had been exemplary.

life, and now, far from concealing her friend, an enemy might have said she flaunted him. Luke and his mother ignored the situation as long as they could. Luke had from the first treated Ada's friends with the good-natured tolerance a large boy accords a small one. It was a very becoming attitude, but at present hardly an adequate one, as Mrs. Allen told her son as the moment came when it could no longer be ignored.

"A man ought to protect his young wife," was how she put it.

Luke laughed.

"I'd like you to suggest how I'm to go about 'protecting' Ada."

"You trust Ada, don't you?"

"She'd better let me trust her!" replied Luke, grimly.

"I've sometimes thought," his mother went on, and no one would have suspected the anguish under her calm manner, "I've sometimes thought Ada didn't want you failed her, though she saw its nature was changing. Ada was more reckless, her gaiety on an ever higher key, her anger fiercer, while Luke's nerves were worn to breaking.

"Things can't go on as they have," Mrs. Allen told herself. There would be some sort of a change, she was sure, some final storm. Nor was she mistaken. When it came, she heard its fury far off. It was followed by three days of cloudy silence, when Mrs. Allen saw neither Ada nor Luke but a few meaningless minutes.

The heavy hours dragged on, but neither of them came to her. In the stress of their own affair they forgot her. The strain made her ill. It was in her bed she heard of what had happened.

"I simply told Ada she would have to control herself better in the future," was Luke's version. "I told her that I could not go out with her every night. My health won't stand it. My business suffers."

"What did she say to that?" his mother asked him.

"Oh, she made a row at first," he answered. "I expected that; but afterward she became reasonable—surprisingly reasonable for Ada. I ought to have taken a stand sooner."

Mrs. Allen feared this reasonableness of Ada's, from whom she soon learned the other side.

"I don't know whether Luke's told you or not," Ada said, "what he's done. He's practically cut me adrift. He's through Luke was very much pleased.

"I should have acted much sooner," he told his mother. Of his own accord, he began to be more expansive with Ada.

"Oh, if he prefers me like this," Ada told Mrs. Allen, "he can have me!"

Mrs. Allen had always been a frail woman, and now she became a shadow, so fast had she fed herself into the furnace of their lives. Even Luke noticed it, and called in a doctor, who said that she was run down and gave her a tonic. But tonics were of very little account beside what Mrs. Allen now had to face. The catastrophe she had so dreaded began to take form.

Its form was, as from the first she had imagined it would be, that of a young man. He was tall, dark, intense, and he kept his eager eyes ostentatiously on Ada. Ada ignored him, snubbed him, flattered him, petted him, and ignored him again. But that was not the significant part of it to Mrs. Allen. She had seen Ada ring the changes of her moods with a series of men. In Ada's world Mrs. Allen had realized early in her stay the perpetual presence of young men was part of the social game. This young man, however, was different from the others. Neither Ada's rudeness nor her indifference moved him, for Ada gave her admirers the full broadside of her moods; not Luke himself got them less veiled. If one couldn't live at Ada's emotional pace, one could go. Ada had never concealed anything in her to trust her quite so much."

"Oh, I don't know what Ada wants," Luke broke out, "but I'll tell you what she won't get—and that's a scene from me. I do trust Ada, I trust her absolutely—but she can make her mind up to the fact that I'm not going to play jealous husband."

Mrs. Allen could only repeat, "I think a man owes it to himself to look after his wife."

"I think he owes it to himself not to be a fool—no matter what his wife is!" Luke replied. "Ada's making a fool of herself. She'll stop—or she won't."

At the grimness of his tone, Mrs. Allen's heart stopped beating, then raced on at full speed.

"And you won't lift your finger?" she asked, feebly.

"Ada's always made a great fuss about how much she cares for me," he answered, irrelevantly. "Let her prove it, then. I've borne a good deal from Ada, but she needn't try me too far!"

"Do you mean you'll—cast her off?" Ada's tragic phrase came of itself to Mrs. Allen's lips.

"It seems to me that it's Ada who 'casts me off,'" her son replied.

As time went on, Ada brought up the subject of what Mrs. Allen termed, for want of a better word, "the state of things," at first tentatively and then with more and more frankness.

"You see now, don't you?" she told her mother-in-law, "that what I said at first is quite true? Luke's through with me."

"I don't think, my dear," Mrs. Allen replied, mildly, "that you have a right to say that."

"I call shoving your wife—fairly shoving her down other men's throats, being through with her," Ada lucidly explained her position. "If Luke were prepared to play the part of complaisant husband, he couldn't shut his eyes more firmly—"

"Luke trusts you, Ada," Mrs. Allen interrupted, "and you know the part of 'complaisant husband,' as you call it, is one which Luke could never play."

"Oh, I know that," Ada laughed, bitterly. "He'll go on what he calls 'trusting me' until he can't trust me any longer; then he'll throw me over—unless I save him the trouble."

"Do you really mean that you think Luke will ever have cause not to trust you?" Mrs. Allen inquired, anxiously.

"I can't live this way forever," Ada asserted.

"But you love Luke, Ada!" Mrs. Allen cried. "You know you love him!"

"I don't know anything else all day and all night," Ada replied, somberly. "That's the worst of it! That's the awful part of it! If I didn't love him, things would be simple enough. I've thought so often lately that if I cut myself off from him forever, perhaps I could endure life better."

Mrs. Allen was silent. She sat in her customary tranquil pose, a little troubled frown her only sign of disturbance. Ada was stretched out on the divan, abandon and despair in every fold of her elaborate white peignoir. After a moment of reflection, Mrs. Allen spoke.

"I suppose there are few women in this world who have all the love they want."

Ada raised herself abruptly, and her chin in her hand, stared at her mother-in-law with beautiful, tragic eyes.

"Do you mean all women in the world are hungry—as I am?" she demanded.

"Most women set great store on being cared for—" "Love" was a word that passed Mrs. Allen's lips with difficulty.

"Did you ever feel that way?" Ada demanded again.

Mrs. Allen flushed delicately. It did not come easy to say such things. She hesitated a moment.

"As a young woman I did," she confessed at last. "But I got over it—I had Luke, you see—and in the end Luke's father grew to depend on me. Women have to be patient in this world, Ada."

But at this Ada flamed out. "I'm not patient—I don't want to be patient! A woman's youth goes while she's patient, and then there's nothing left for her! No one will care for her then. I don't want a life empty of love! And if Luke won't care for me as I care for him, why the best thing would be for me to forget him!"

She rose partly from the divan and fixed Mrs. Allen with sombre eyes; and as the older woman returned the gaze she knew that for herself Ada spoke the truth.

"Luke does care for you, Ada," she said in a low voice.

Ada's laugh was dreary.

"He's an odd way of showing it. Why does he let us go as we are?" She spoke as if the march of events was quite outside her control; and so, in a measure, they were, Mrs. Allen acknowledged.

"Luke won't lift a finger—you'll see," Ada finished.

"Oh, Ada!" cried Mrs. Allen. "Oh, my child! I'd give my life to help you! The wish of her heart found utterance."

Ada put her hands on her mother-in-law's shoulders, and looked down on her from her greater height.

"I believe you would," she said. "I believe you'd do just that! Well, I'll do my best, but that won't be much. When things get to the breaking point, they just break."

Disaster lay heavy in the air. Mrs. Allen began to watch Ada's comings and goings. She prowled the house at night, waiting, a wan little ghost in a gray flannelette gown, for the tragedy. She would wait until one o'clock, two o'clock, three o'clock, for the clang of a carriage door and the fumble of the key in the lock, and Ada's soft silken rustle as she came rapidly up the stairs. Then only would Mrs. Allen go to her rest. Often she would open the window and lean out, looking for the carriage.

To do this, she had to leave her own room at the back of the house and make her way to an empty guest chamber. One night she was leaning out of the window, in an agony of expectation. A presentiment of evil hung over her. She felt herself grow chilled in the cold air, but she couldn't leave. She must stay there until the familiar carriage swung around the corner and Ada was home, safe for another day. So absorbed was she that she didn't hear a footstep behind her, until a voice said: "What are you doing here?"

She turned, trembling with cold and fright, to find herself face to face with Luke.

"What are you doing here, mother?" he repeated. By the electric light which shone in from the street, she could see his face was pale and drawn.

"I'm—I'm waiting for Ada," she faltered.

"Are you waiting for her to come, or for her to stay away?" he demanded. "What made you wait to-night?"

"I often wait, Luke," she answered him. "Oh, you often wait, do you?" he said.

"Perhaps you wait every night—as I wait. Do you? Answer me! Do you?"

He would have gone on, the flood-gates of his bitterness open at last; but,—

"Hush!" his mother said, "Hush! What right have you to talk like that! You've only to raise your hand to make it come right. It's your miserable pride; it's your hardness. You've only to let her know that you've waited—"

She paused abruptly. "Hush!" she said again.

The door was closing, Ada's foot was on the stairs; and Mrs. Allen, in her gray flannelette "mother-hubbard," swayed to and fro like some absurd rag doll, and would have fallen but for her son.

Together they carried her to her bed. They didn't speak until Luke explained grimly: "She was waiting for you to come back."

At that Mrs. Allen opened her eyes and said feebly, her accusing eyes on her son: "He was waiting for you, too." Then, after her supreme effort, she closed her eyes again, and it was the last coherent word she said for many days.

There followed a space of time that did not divide itself off into nights and days, and, through her fever, Mrs. Allen had the sensation of being taken care of. She fancied herself a little girl again, and a large, shining presence enfolded her in its caressing care. In her delirium, she called this presence "mother." There were other people there too, men and women, but Mrs. Allen's brain refused to untangle their personalities. She clung resolutely to that stronger one, that took care of her as her own mother had when she was a little girl, so many years ago. Then, as her consciousness came slowly to the surface again, the other personalities resolved themselves into a nurse and a doctor and Luke, hollow-eyed and haggard; little by little, her "mother" transformed herself into Ada. But though the vision of her mother had faded, there remained with Mrs. Allen the memory of incessant care, of long nights of watching.

She looked at Ada. Unlike Luke, she showed little trace of the strain she had been under. There was not nearly as much distress visible now as after one of her conflicts with Luke. There was, indeed, a high, shining serenity about her, as of a person who has a work to do, and who knows how to do it. How true Mrs. Allen's instinct was, she could gather from the doctor, who turned to Ada with a quiet admiration.

"You've pulled her through," he said. Ada's large eyes rested on him in beautiful surprise.

"Of course I've pulled her through," she said. There was a hint of indignation at the doctor's suggested alternative. "What," she seemed to demand, "do you think of me? Do you think that I'd let my mother die like that—die when I was here to prevent it?"

Her beauty shone on Elizabeth Allen like a reassuring star after a night of tempest. Vaguely, somewhere in the back of her brain Mrs. Allen noticed that Ada seemed steadier than she had ever yet seen her. She went over and slipped her hand into Luke's. She did it almost absent-mindedly, as one takes a comrade's arm. There was none of her old challenge in it; and as for Luke, he seemed grateful for this attention. They had fought Death shoulder to shoulder, Ada commanding officer, the captain of their forlorn hope, Luke under her command. Their greater anxiety had been a solvent of all their old bitterness. Weak and sick as Mrs. Allen was, one thing shone out so luminous that she could not but be aware of it, and it was the shifting of balance which had gone on between them all. During the time she had been in the vague country of sickness, on the borderland between life and death, momentous things had been happening between her children.

As the days wore on, she noticed, that it was Luke who sought out Ada tenderly, and asked her permission to spend time beside his mother. They had much silent intercourse, the mother and son, and the things that Luke had to tell her were not the things one can speak aloud. But it gave Mrs. Allen courage to approach Ada on the subject that occupied her mind so much. What she said summed up all her observations since she had come back to life. They were:

"You seem happier than I have ever seen you before."

"I am," Ada met her with promptness. "I've saved you," she explained with her customary lucidity, "out of the wreck of things that Luke and I between us so nearly made. And," she went on, "I am going to keep on saving you. You're going to be happy."

Mrs. Allen almost found herself fancying that Ada had added, "—whether anybody else is or not."

She put her arms around her mother-in-law's frail shoulders with almost savage passion. It was a gesture as of a mother. Mrs. Allen might indeed have been the little girl she fancied herself in her delirium, Ada's little child.

"You poor little thing!" Ada murmured, "don't worry about Luke and me ever again. You've seen for yourself everything's all right between us, all right for ever and ever."

She held her mother close for a moment. Then she went on superbly:

"Luke understands what a stiff-necked brute he was to let things go on as he did, when he cared so awfully. Think of his waiting up night after night!" A little clear flame blazed in Ada's eyes. "Waiting up night after night for me, and never letting me know he did it, and making you all that trouble! It was all so unnecessary!" she cried, "all our trouble! Why, if I'd known he waited up once, not anything would have happened. But it's his waiting and not letting me know—letting things get to such a pass, that's so hard to understand, when it's so easy to let people see when you care for them. But I've forgiven him, don't be afraid; we have made a clean sweep of it. And it was you made us. I don't for a moment mean I'm not to blame as much as Luke," Ada conceded with a large gesture. "I ought to have seen myself what was happening; I ought to have protected you, and both of us; but I was so wrapped up in Luke, you know."

Mrs. Allen thought over the things that Ada had put before her. "Do you mean," she said at last, "that you are less wrapped up in him now?" "I mean,"

Ada replied, "that I understand now that there is more in the world than just Luke and my love for him and his for me. There is you. Nobody," she repeated, "shall ever bother you again, nobody!"

three-quarters cup thin cream. Boil the sugar, syrup and butter together until it spins a thread, gradually add the cream. Pour over the ice-cream and sprinkle with chopped nuts.

Chocolate Sauce. One square chocolate, three tablespoons sugar, one cup boiling water, two inches of stick cinnamon, one and three quarter cups sugar, one teaspoon vanilla. Melt the chocolate over hot water. Add three tablespoons sugar and the boiling water gradually, stirring constantly, when smooth and glossy add the sugar and cinnamon and stir until boiling begins, let boil five minutes, strain, cool and add vanilla.

Marshmallow Sauce. Two tablespoons hot water, one quarter pound marshmallows, one-half teaspoon vanilla. Break marshmallows in pieces and melt over hot water. Add the hot water and cook until mixture is smooth. Add vanilla and beat thoroughly.

Parfaits and Mousses are frozen without stirring. The mixture is packed in moulds and the moulds buried in a mixture of equal parts of ice and rock salt for several hours. Coffee tins or baking powder tins make very satisfactory moulds. Mould should be placed on ice until it is thoroughly cold then filled very full. Before putting on the lid cover with oiled paper. Put on cover and bind with a strip of cotton dipped in melted fat. Bury the mould in the freezing mixture three or four hours.

Pineapple Mousse. To one-half cup heated pineapple juice add one-half tablespoon of gelatine softened in one quarter cup cold water, one-half cup sugar, and one tablespoon lemon juice. Strain and let cool. As the mixture thickens fold in the whip from one pint cream. Mould and pack in ice and salt for four hours. These are basic recipes. Any desired fruit or flavour may be used.

ing the vitamine A. Practically all the vegetables and fruits furnish vitamine B, and many fruits have been found to supply vitamine C. Lemons, oranges and tomatoes are especially rich in it. It is now believed that the vitamins are, to some extent, destroyed by cooking, particularly in the presence of soda. It is wise, therefore, to use regularly some uncooked fruits or tomatoes, fresh or canned, and some green leaf vegetables. The amounts required seem to be very small, and one is probably on the safe side if she makes a practice of introducing small amounts of lemon or orange juice in preparing desserts, and small amounts of tomato juice in making gravies, sauces and soups. Regularity of supply is probably more important than large amounts.

GROUP II. MILK AND ITS PRODUCTS, EGGS, MEAT AND SIMILAR FOODS.

This group provides material which may be converted into energy to do the day's work. It is valued chiefly though, for the protein it provides for building body tissues. Milk is especially rich in lime and meat, and eggs in iron, and this adds to their building power. Milk and eggs also supply vitamine A. In the diet of the adult all the foods of this group are interchangeable. In the diet of children, however, nothing can take the place of milk.

GROUP III. CEREAL GRAINS AND THEIR PRODUCTS

These foods are rich in starch and are a valuable source of energy. They also contain protein and so contribute to tissue building, but they cannot take the place of Group II. If they are made from whole grains they contain mineral substances and vitamins. At times when green vegetables are hard to obtain the use of whole grain products should be increased.

GROUP IV. SUGAR AND SUGAR FOODS

This group includes all the different kinds of sugar, honey, molasses, syrups, candy, rich preserves and jams. These foods are pure fuel and contribute only to energy and to flavour. They are therefore not as essential as those of the other groups. If, however, sweets are used in proper proportion to the other food materials and are not served in a way as to destroy the appetite for other foods, they have an important place in the diet.

GROUP V. FATS AND FAT FOODS

This group includes, butter, cream, oil, bacon, pork, chocolate, rich nuts and cooking fats. They contribute to energy production and give richness and flavour. Butter and cream furnish vitamine A and, for this reason, have great advantage over the other members of the group.

An easy way for the homemaker to be sure that she is furnishing the kinds of food the body needs is to see that foods from each of these five groups are served each day. There are, however, other points in the planning of meals which must be considered. "As long as beauty is a part of life and the spirit more than meat, the homemaker will take pride in assembling her family about a board which delights the life and makes the mouth water." So we must give attention to the variety that comes from differences in form, colour, texture, and flavour of foods. Moreover, we must take care to serve foods under conditions favourable to their digestion. The following suggestions, based upon the principles outlined above, may help you to make your meals adequate, wholesome and attractive.

GENERAL SUGGESTIONS FOR MEAL PLANNING

1. Take the day, or better still, the week, as a unit in planning, rather than the single meal.
2. Include something from each of the food groups in each day's meals.
3. Use special care to include the protective foods. Serve milk, cream or butter in every meal and some uncooked fruit or leaf vegetable every day in the year if possible.
4. Avoid serving too much from one group in the same meal. For example, poached eggs and custard furnish an unnecessary amount of protein; rice, potatoes and corn too much starch; and pork, fried potatoes and pie too much fat.
5. Serve foods which stimulate the appetite and the flow of digestive juices early in the meal. Begin breakfast with fruit, and dinner with a thin savory soup. Serve sweets, which dull the appetite at the close of the meal.
6. Serve concentrated foods with something which will serve to dilute them, for example cheese with crackers or macaroni; rich preserves with plain bread, not with rich cake.
7. Flavour stimulates the flow of digestive juices. For this reason serve foods of pronounced flavour with pork, goose and other fat meats, difficult of digestion.
8. Two or more foods which are difficult of digestion should not be served the same day, much less in the same meal. Griddle cakes, pork chops, mince pie or plum pudding and doughnuts are better combined with foods easier to digest and spread over several days.
9. Plan meals so there will not be a sameness of flavour, form, temperature or texture.
10. Avoid serving a food which gives pronounced character to a dish twice in the same meal. If tomato soup forms the first course, avoid tomato catsup or Chili sauce with the meat course, or tomato salad.
11. With the exception of staples, such as bread, butter and milk, avoid serving the same food, even in a different form, twice in one day.
12. Keep a balance between different courses. Serve a light dessert with a heavy main course and vice versa. Follow a hot course with a cold one, a bland one with a highly flavoured one, a fluid one with a solid one.
13. Include in each meal foods suited to the needs of each member of the family, hearty foods for the healthy hard working adult, and plain, easily digested food for children and the aged.
14. In summer serve, less often, foods rich in fats. Keep cool by eating less protein and more fruits and vegetables.
15. Study variety in preparing staple foods. Keep out of ruts in cooking. There are many ways to serve the most common foods. Vegetables may be made into dozens of dishes, no two alike, and fruits are the foundation of hundreds of simple and appetizing desserts and salads.

That Expensive Equipment

BY NINA MOORE JAMIESON

TALKING now about hot lunch for rural schools may seem out of season, considering that it is done with for the past winter, and some distance ahead for next. But "in times of peace prepare for war" you know, and this hot lunch business takes a good deal of advance campaigning.

We have had it in our school for two winters, and it is not likely to be dropped in the future, because the children are so pleased with it. There was opposition to it on the start—oh yes! I was one of the committee appointed by the Women's Institute to interview the trustees about installing the standard equipment and I remember that interview. The head trustee who was retiring at the end of the was storekeeper, and we women had inveigled our trustee-husbands there by secret arrangement among ourselves, to confront them with their committee-wives and spring this Women's Institute proposition upon them.

"Who'll pay for it?" asked an interested rate-payer who sat on a keg of nails and heckled us in our campaign.

"What's the idea of giving youngsters a hot cup of tea at dinner time?" asked another. "Tea—huh!"

Well, we tried to explain that the Government gave a grant and helped both in starting and in carrying on the plan; and we pointed out that there was no cup of tea in the bond—it was to be a hot nourishing dish to supplement the cold lunch year, according to custom, had just one ambition—to slide out of office without committing himself one way or the other on the subject. He did it, too.

The second trustee was an agreeable man. Whatever the other fellows thought that's what he thought. Yes, the Hot Lunch was all right, and No, it was rather a fad. Yes, it was a good thing to give the youngsters something hot, and No, home was the place for them to learn cookery.

"Who'd wash the dishes?" they demanded, as soon as we had propounded the situation.

"It'd be a very nice thing for the teacher to get her hot dinner at the expense of the section," was another remark that came to us. We had the meeting in the store at Donnybrook, because the head trustee from home, cocoa or milk, soup or something of that sort. We held forth to an ever increasing audience, on the fact that this scheme ran itself. The teacher superintended, the youngsters washed the dishes, and all got the benefit.

Then one of the committee women made a bold speech. "They have this in other schools," said she "and make a success of it. Aren't we as capable here as any other section? The teachers like it—it helps to keep a good teacher. It will help you to sell your farms to first class tenants if you can say—'Our school? Oh it's right up to date—we serve hot lunch, you know!' You say 'Taxes!' I say—'Fiddle sticks!' It won't raise your taxes by the price of one week's tobacco! You'll come to it some day—why not come to

Duke was murmuring on: "Dear me, I nearly forgot something which may be important. Darling Patricia would have been so vexed—no, not vexed; she's never vexed with her poor Duke!—but grieved. She asked me to ask what you've done with the doll!"

"Doll—what doll?" I echoed.

"Wendela: Your prize."

"My curse, you mean. That yellow-haired abomination! I had to take it. I couldn't leave it in the Atrium when the prizes were distributed. I had the beastly thing sent to the hotel in a cab, and it's upstairs now in my room, in a piece of paper. I'd have burned it and danced round the sacrificial pyre if the monstrosity hadn't been too big for the fireplace—might have started a conflagration. It's about the size of a ten year old child, and—"

"That's why Patricia wants it. She asked if you'd make it a present to her."

"I suppose she expects Petro to bait it, and finally do the lion and martyr act," I said. "I should like to be present at the ceremony. I'd cheer Petro on!"

"I don't think Petro is to have Wendela," said Miss Wellington.

"Oh, hasn't Pat—Miss Kapieha—outgrown dolls yet? Or does she want this fat-faced thing for a kind of mascot, to fly with—or something?"

"I believe she does want Wendela for a kind of mascot, as you say, but not to fly with," returned the Duke with an expression like that of a negro who said "I aint telling nobody nuffing, and I don't tell nuffin to nobody, but I know ebbery-thing."

"Well, I must go now," she announced noncommittally. "I'll call for the doll at your hotel if you'll give me a note to the landlady. Patricia might be needing it at any time. I suppose you're still having bad luck about the petrol?"

"Very bad," I admitted. "All the garages have sold out, and my landlord—who promised to get me some—has failed. I feel in my bones he's been got at by the trio. They're dogs in the manger. They don't really want to fly themselves, especially with me (they don't know yet about Patchinka as pilot) and they'll keep me from starting if by any means they can get the secret of the aeroplane while remaining comfortably where they are. Maroni's a coward and won't fly for any inducement; yet somehow I feel he's the worst of the lot and the most dangerous. He's determined that I shan't get off if he can prevent it. But by Jove, he shan't! The three are counting on my going to sleep, or getting bored and leaving the plane alone some night, so a flight won't be necessary. But I'll show them!"

"So will I show them!" repeated Miss Wellington.

I didn't laugh this time. I was wondering how I could placate Wendela and accustom her to the idea of Miss Wellington in the hangar of "her aeroplane." But it was I who paid for the hangar. And I could generally persuade Wendela when I took the trouble—except where Patchinka was concerned.

Miss Wellington drove off in quest of the doll. And time drew on to seven o'clock. But by seven I had all arrangements made, and was ready for what might happen.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

A Certain "Fishiness."

WENDELA popped in at six-thirty that evening, just as my nerves had begun to thrill with the thought of Patchinka en patrol at the Cap.

Miss Horden's habit was to run in and out during the day, to see how we got on with 'her dear Mascot,' but she had never before favoured us at this hour. I guessed that she must have heard of Miss Wellington's visit, and thought the best thing was to make a clean breast of the plan we'd arranged.

I mentioned in a gay, casual tone, that I had been provided with an understudy

The Idol of Youth

Wendela objected at first, when she heard who it was, because Miss Wellington was more or less identified in her mind with the "enemy," but my eloquence resigned her to the situation.

To insist that Miss Kapieha was not the "enemy," was to go wearily over old ground. The ground was equally old and worn under my distrust of her friends Mendez, Dupont and Maroni; but Miss Horden was too much of her father's daughter not to share my sentiments there to a certain extent, under her surface acceptance of the Syndicate's flattery. She realized that the men might be plotting damage to her property, for their own secret ends; and I made her admit that it was difficult to replace myself as a trustworthy guardian. Miss Wellington was disinterested: Petro was efficient; and young Viale was a useful prop for their united qualities.

"All right, as long as Miss Kapieha doesn't come and sit with her worthy friend," Wendela grudgingly at last. "But I should soon hear of that, if she did, and you'd have to stop her doing it."

Miss Horden lingered on till the arrival of the lady and the dog, perhaps with the intention of snubbing the Iron Duke. This would have been an easy way of enjoying herself, for Miss Wellington was as meek as she was virtuous; but the expression on Petro's face caused the girl promptly to forget any hostile intention. His frown was quite as remarkable as his smile, and must have been akin to that of "Ben Bolt," whose sign of displeasure caused "sweet Alice" to "tremble with fear."

In no other way did Wendela resemble that sensitive maiden, but when Petro had gazed thoughtfully at her ankles, (so much thicker than those of his mistress) she tripped swiftly to the door of the hangar. If I were going to the hotel she would wait outside and bear me company up the hill, she suggested.

From this, however, I excused myself. I must have a chat with young Viale, I pleaded. This gave me an excuse to linger in the hope of a telephone message; but none came, and I abandoned hope for the night.

The next evening I drew blank also; but instead of wasting time in sleep I went to Cap Martin and saw Patchinka. I felt as if a year had passed since our last meeting. There were a thousand things to say, and twice a thousand things I wished to say but must not.

After hearing from her of the few latest developments concerning Laurette, there was news of our progress in the hangar to tell. I made sketches in my note book of what Viale's men had done and were doing to transform the biplane for passenger use, and Patchinka's head almost touched mine as she examined the papers.

There was news of Monte Carlo in the throes of the railway strike to give also, and stories to tell of several offers I'd had, since the public turned its attention to aeroplanes. They were good offers, from substantial men of business who wished to reach Paris and even London in a hurry. But Wendela's promise to Dupont stood in the way of immediate acceptance. She herself seemed to regret this, as things were turning out, but couldn't "go back on her word."

One advantage reaped from these outside propositions, however, was that I'd been able to get down to bed rock of business with the Trio. Each had a good sum of money—brought, no doubt, with the intention of buying Kapieha's Mascot from the winner; and now that they were reluctantly obliged to pool their interests, they'd pooled their money as well.

It was agreed that I should take Mendez to Algieras, from which place he explained, he would prefer to travel by rail to Barcelona. Dupont's destination was Hamada, in Algeria, a small oasis town or village I had never heard of, between Biskra and Touggourt. For the flight each would pay fifteen thousand francs, the whole sum to be deposited in a bank at Monte Carlo in notes, to be touched by me on my return from the trip.

After that, I would be free to take other flights with other passengers and make more money, both for Miss Horden and myself; for Maroni was true to his resolution not to fly anywhere with "an amateur," and the trip to Spain and Algeria would be done "in one."

Everything seemed fair and above board, or would have seemed so, if—the Syndicate hadn't been the Syndicate; and if we hadn't been pretty sure of what the real design on Kapieha's Mascot was. These men believed that plans for a new invention of immense value were hidden somewhere in the biplane; and they must have had valid grounds for their theory, or they would not, all three, have rushed to Monte Carlo when the machine was offered as second prize in a lottery. Patchinka's idea was that Sacha must have dropped some hint of what he meant to do, before he had reason to distrust the men; and that later, he had either forgotten, or had changed his plan for the hiding-place to another which the three men would know nothing about. In any case, the trio had met, and had been compelled to unite. They had almost succeeded in obtaining the biplane from Wendela Horden; and though they had failed, they were still determined to wring some measure of success out of apparent failure.

This meant that they intended to get the machine into their power, and to prevent Miss Kapieha or me from protecting it. The question was, how did they expect to accomplish this brilliant result?

At first, they'd evidently schemed to keep me at Monte Carlo, and to tire out my vigilance in the hangar. Now, they realized that this was easier said than done. If I could get petrol, I would fly—with them or someone else. Maybe they still hoped that I would not get petrol, and certainly they were doing all they could to corner the small remaining supply: but on the surface, two out of the three were making arrangements for a flight with me. They were making arrangements financially worth my while to take them where (they said) they wished to go; and there would be nothing "fishy" about the payment.

Several other details, however, struck Patchinka and me as being distinctly of the "fishy" order. For instance, why was Mendez content to stop at Algieras, an easy landing-place from my point of view, but a difficult one from his? He was paying high for the voyage; why not insist on his money's worth by prolonging it a little further to some big city where railway travel was easy to Barcelona, even if he didn't care to fly to Barcelona itself? He had replied to a question on this subject by saying that he didn't like aeroplanes and would be glad to touch terra firma as soon as possible. This might be true; but if so, why not make a point of landing first, and letting me proceed with Dupont alone, later, to Algeria? Instead of this, he—a selfish man—gave Dupont the preference. He waives his dislike to air travel for the sake of his junior, who, it seemed, had "pressing business in Algeria."

By the look of Hamada on the map, there wasn't room for "pressing business" in it. "Pressing business" would stamp the spot out of existence altogether; yet Dupont was keen to get there—just there, of all other places, though he might as well land close to the city of Algiers, or Biskra, thus saving time for Mendez.

Dupont, however, was not without his excuse, which matched in plausibility that of Mendez. He had a partner at Hamada, who was waiting for him to fix up the matter of a "concession." The oasis was for sale, with a magnificent output of dates; and if the partners didn't decide to buy before a certain time limit expired, others would obtain it.

As for Maroni, he too was mysterious. He might be the coward he confessed himself, about air-travel; indeed, he looked it! But I could hardly believe that he would so lightly abandon all his

THE terrible loss of life during the Great War meant that interest in all which concerns revelation of a future life should be stimulated greatly. Consequently, spiritualists of many varieties and sooth-sayers of curious brands came forward with nebulous comfort regarding "The beyond." Some of the would-be comforters may have been sincere—many of them are charlatans, making money out of the most pathetic of all human cravings—that which cries—

"Oh for the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still!"

Several well-known Englishmen have had much to say on the subject of our communication with those who are dead. Among these, perhaps the most popular and conspicuous is Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, who has recently visited the cities of this continent, relating his experiences by way of spiritualistic adventure and expressing his belief in various "messages," said to be sent from another world. Now, Sir Arthur was delightful as a writer of detective stories; and we shall always regard his Sherlock Holmes as one who has added much to the entertainment of nations; but as an adventurer in the so-called spirit world, we cannot regard him with admiration. His "revelations" can hardly be given either scientific or spiritual value, while the general trend of his "teaching" is not to be called wholesome or helpful. A Toronto journalist, Miss Anne Merrill, deserves the thanks of her readers for having related her own unsatisfying experience in London, in search of such "light" as the discourses of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle could shed. These exploiters of spooks are not to be cultivated by those who wish to gain "daily strength for daily needs," while there are many sad instances of the unsettling effect of a series of seances.

We do not say "there is nothing in it," but we believe that what is in it is of evil rather than of good. In short, the seance is a fine thing to avoid. Canada has had her own share of these specialists in spiritualism. There is Dr. Watson of Toronto, for instance, who wrote "The Twentieth Plane," about four years ago—a book which professed to give messages from the other world. Plato, Samuel Taylor, Coleridge and other intellectual leaders sent through Mr. Louis Benjamin various messages concerning philosophy and psychical progress. The ouija board, of course, came in for its share of compliments, and the makers of these mystic boards must have rejoiced in the large sale of the "Twentieth Plane." It was noticeable, however, that the literary style of the gentlemen who were joy-riding on the Twentieth Plane had fallen off sadly in the course of their spiritual progress and that they indulged in colloquialisms unbecoming their lofty abode and (alleged) celestial manners. Dr. Watson, it is said, has lately withdrawn from the psychical experts, as they have shown that they have excessively material aims. The doctor is doubtless sincere in his research, but we really doubt the Sunday afternoon talks which have been secured from Coleridge, who was an extremely lazy person while on Earth and who must be extremely bored by all this desire to hear from him in his present environment.

No one who has watched the marvelous development of transmission of sound is going to exclaim "impossible" at the suggestion that there are revelations awaiting us in the realm of psychic phenomena. In that region, however, the wisest move slowly and speak softly. They do not "trumpet" their experiences, nor do they seek to make money out of the recently bereft who are seeking consolation.

A poem entitled, "The Rest is Silence," signed "Mary," which recently appeared in the New York "Sun" expresses the feeling of many of us:—

I do not think the dead can speak to us:
Else would the old man's wife come back to him
Whose very soul she was, and coming thus
Be comfort to his desolation dim:
Else would the mother soothe the little child
Who calls for her at night with sobbing wild.

Or, knowing we shall follow them in turn,
Perhaps they fail to comprehend our hearts;
Not that their own to us are changed and stern,
But that with death the temporal departs:
No more they live in earthly days and years,
And do not guess how long the time appears.

The music of the manner of their lives
May waken singing echoes now and then,
The immortality that here survives
A little while, in memories of men;
But they themselves make answer not at all—
Are they but slaves, to hasten when we call?

Wizards we have that peep and mutter yet,
And women who will work a charm for pay,
Who catch the foolish in a flimsy net;
Or if indeed they summon, as they say,
Spirits that wander in the world outside—
They are not those who here have lived and died.

If I could think the great and stately dead,
The dear and gracious dead, degraded
so,
To speak through phantoms of a trickster's head
Or spell out words inanely in a row—
If I could think they suffer such disgrace,
I would arise and curse God to his face.

That Expensive Equipment

it now, instead of dragging in at the tail of the procession?"

It was a good speech but it failed. Somebody had told those trustees that the Women's Institute was trying to run them, and they laid back their ears and balked, solid. Oh don't think I'm making fun of them—bless you, I'm married to one of them! However, one of their main stumbling blocks was the expense of the equipment, and the fact that our teacher was leaving at Christmas. If the new teacher did not think well of the idea then they would be left a laughing stock, with all that apparatus on their hands.

So we came home discouraged, feeling that we had made matters worse by our interfering. It would not do for the Institute to go ahead in face of this determined opposition and anyway, the Institute represented several school sections and could not be expected to concentrate on ours.

Well, behold you, the trustees went on record at their Annual Meeting, as being distinctly unfavorable to the project, and then we Institute women sat back in thoughtful silence and waited for the moon to change.

It changed sure enough. Our little new teacher changed it. She was speaking to me one day about the school, and voiced her regret at the trustees' unalterable attitude on the hot lunch question. "I wonder why they feel that way?" she said thoughtfully.

"They don't—they only think they do," I said quickly. "We went at them wrongly. We should have talked it up among our families first, and given the men a chance to understand it thoroughly before we set it up to them. We hurried them. And then they were afraid of being left with that expensive equipment—"

"Expensive equipment!" echoed the teacher. "What expensive equipment?"

"The stove, the kettles—whatever the Department has authorized," I said uncertainly. A great light broke upon her.

"There's stove enough there," she said.

"No equipment is necessary—to me. I've handled it before. If I have a kettle to make the soup or cocoa in, and a spoon to serve it with.....and if the youngsters bring each a cup and spoon—but what's the use? The trustees are against it—"

I snapped my fingers. "That for the trustees!" (I'm married to one of them, as I think I told you.) "Come on and tell me what you need."

She told me, and soon the word went abroad. Children asked at home for a cup and spoon. Two or three women sent beans, and cocoa, and sugar and anything they thought suitable. One woman, determined to give the thing a good start, ground up beef and vegetables and sent the "makings" of an appetizing Irish stew.

The trustees if they heard of it, kept very mum. They never batted an eye, or mentioned their absurd motion upon the books. The teacher had one or two enthusiasts at her back who were ready to help her with anything, and so you can see the thing was just running on wheels!

As for the youngsters, they are very cheerful over it. Once, when the teacher wanted a piece of pork to put in with a kettle of beans, children who walked two miles to school brought her, in their zeal, about four pounds of side meat, they tell me! My little folks are very proud over their dishwashings and wipings. Every now and then a dishtowel comes home to be washed. Some mornings they go away with a potato in each coat pocket. They report all sorts of good dinners!

Mashed potatoes seems a favorite dish. Some of us who make butter send down a pound now and then, and I do think that mashed potatoes with milk and butter in them, should please any hungry school child! They have boiled rice, and occasional rice or sago or tapioca puddings: tomato soup, bean soup, potato soup, macaroni soup—it makes our mouths water, at home, to hear of it!

But oh, I must tell you—the trustees solemnly bought a coal oil stove, and I can't tell you what in the line of kettles

"Hot weather Cooking holds No Terrors for me now!"

"How I dread the kitchen in this hot weather! It gets unbearably hot, and I get all out of sorts."

"Well, I sympathize with you because I've been through it. But we bought a Moffat Electric Range last spring. Hot weather cooking holds no terrors for me now."

MOFFAT heat is concentrated like glowing coals in a hearth. The heat does not spread all over the kitchen. It is concentrated under the pot or pan.

And, thanks to the wonderful Moffat element, you can boil or cook food faster than on any other electric range. You can boil a quart of water over a Moffat burner in ten minutes! This remarkable feat cannot be duplicated on any other make of range. Moffat burners, furthermore, are practically indestructible.

Then the Moffat One-Piece Oven. Run your hand over the outside of a Moffat Oven and it will feel only slightly warm, even though there is roasting heat within.

Then it is perfectly ventilated, and to make it sanitary and easy to clean it is porcelain enameled inside and out. A thermometer on the oven door tells the exact degree of heat inside.

Simply Turn a Switch

Simple turns of the switches give you low, medium or high heat—as required. Each switch is away from the burner, is well protected against moisture or accident and is clearly named. It is cheaper to cook on a Moffat than with any other fuel; it is powerfully built, handsome and graceful, cooks faster, is economical, exquisitely clean and thoroughly efficient. There are 28,000 Moffat Electric Ranges in daily use.

The Moffat Electric Range stands for kitchen comfort at all times, for better cooking and for all-round satisfaction. Write for free booklet and prices to Moffats, Limited, Weston, Ontario.

The Idol of Youth

hopes in favour of Mendez and Dupont, who would not regard the interests of an absentee when his back was turned. No, there was something "fishy" about Maroni's resolve not to fly; just as fishy as the others' plans for flying.

"Has he got in with Doctor Silvestro?" Patchinka and I asked each other. "Does Silvestro know about the hidden petrol, and if he does, can he hypnotize Laurette to tell him where it is?"

This brought us back to the subject of the Villa Persane. Nothing had happened there yet—at least, nothing that Patchinka had heard of. She was awaiting Guiseppe's signal, and the time was right for our scheme; the moon was nearly full. But, yes, one thing she had accomplished! She did not wish to tell me what it was, because I would laugh, and it was not a laughing matter. Only this she would say: the thing accomplished concerned the doll. No—not a question! Let us turn to another subject at once. Was I sure that all my preparations were in order, so there need be no delay when I got the message—that one word "Come?"

I said that I was sure.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

After the Signal.

IT was the next night when it happened—a Saturday night; and Viale's work was all but finished.

In order to keep his promise to me, and spite Maroni, Viale had bribed his men to stick to their job till midnight. Before the clock struck the hour, he vowed dramatically that the last nail, the last screw, the last bolt, would be in place. The Kapiha Mascot would then be ready to take the air with five persons on board; pilot, observer, and three passengers.

I was delighted with the way the work had shaped (would have been completely content had we a hundred, or even fifty gallons of petrol!) and I longed to show the finished product of Viale's skill to Sacha's sister.

At a quarter to seven I was inspecting the transformed machine, with Viale himself; and a smart appearance she made as a miniature air-liner. The newly built cabin filled the space over the rear cockpit, and extended above the fuselage which in the Mascot's fighting days had been devoted to bombs. The three-ply walls, composed of three sheets of thin wood with the grain running in different directions to give extra strength, were jewelled with much small-paned window-glass which Viale had protected as best he could with wire netting.

The window-door was placed directly behind the two adjustable seats (set side by side) of pilot and observer, and the cabin had three chairs, fixed to the floor: two in front, one behind, for passengers. Along one side of the cabin ran a railed rack for petrol tins, protected on top by a bar to be locked to both ends; and there was room under each seat—counting those of the pilot and observer—for two more five-gallon tins, with light bars to keep them from moving.

Nothing neater could be desired. But the sight of those empty racks was tormenting my soul when a waiter from the restaurant Suisse came blowing into the hangar. "Eh bien! Pension says—'Come!'"

It was the "one word" agreed upon between Patchinka and me. The hour was seven. Mendez and a bored detective from Nice were representing the "enemy," and my three understudies had just arrived with knitting, dog biscuits, and "La Vie Parisienne" suited to their several tastes. I was free to go, and I did go at once, but not to take tram (all taxis were gone, or their career checked by lack of petrol) for Cap Martin. I ran hot-foot to the hangar where my baby seaplane slept.

She had just enough petrol (secured long in advance) to fly a dozen miles at most; but that was more than enough for my project. What had to be done I must do alone, but I was equal to it all in theory and—I hoped—in practice.

Since my purchase of the Water Baby I hadn't ventured to take her out lest the Syndicate should see me, and suspecting some secret game watch the seaplane's hangar for developments; but I had gone with the owner for a short flight before buying, and felt a fair amount of confidence in my own skill. If only I dared feel the same in the success of the adventure, I should have been a happy man!

The baby's toilet had been made the day I heard of Patchinka's activities at the Cap. She was oiled, and full fed with petrol. I opened the hangar doors, and looked out through purple darkness on to the smooth water of the Harbour. Beyond the bay were the bright, bunched lights of the Casino terrace, and far away a low-lying shadow, which was wooded Cap Martin, like a huge fish floating on the sea. I could hear sounds of music and the cheerful trot, trot, of horses' hoofs in the distance; but in Monaco Harbour all was very quiet at this hour. I ran the Baby down into the water, and so far as I could make out there was no one to hear or witness our start. In the Mascot's hangar, of course, the tell-tale roar of the Water Baby's engine must have reached the ears of Mendez and his detective, but there was no reason why they should associate the noise with me, or take any personal interest in it.

We—the Baby and I—glided agreeably through the dark sea, raising a plume of spray; then lifted our wings and flew above the surface. I wasn't going far enough to rise to any height, and merely skimmed like a glancing bird till it was time to touch water once more. In front of the line of villas on the Cap, which faced seaward in their terraced gardens, I flew back and forth, making all the fuss I could. Then I slid to sea-level and rushed through the tiny waves with an ostentatious splashing.

My heart bumped in my breast. Was I too early? Was I too late? What was happening on shore? Would the signal Patchinka and I had agreed on, be given? And if so should I somehow miss it?..... This was a case of now or never, I feared. If to-night's attempt failed, no other would succeed.

Now, to make things clear, perhaps I had better tell what other people were doing at this time. Naturally, I did not know till afterwards; but you must know, to understand how events shaped themselves for everyone concerned.

Patchinka's vague fear that Doctor Silvestro and one or more members of the Syndicate had got their heads together, must have been put into her mind by the Fairy-Instinct. Maroni and Silvestro had met at Turin. Now, they had met again in the Sporting Club at Monte Carlo, last night for the first time. They had been mere acquaintances at home, but in a strange place the fact that they were fellow Italians, and of the same city, was an attraction. They chatted, and it came out that Silvestro was living at the Villa Persane. Everyone knew about the Fiumines, and though there had been no scandal concerning Laurette and Sacha Kapiha, the two had been spoken of in whispers. The mention of Kapiha's name, led now to the subject of the biplane. Maroni must have boasted friendship with the American girl who had won it in the lottery, and the thought must have jumped into his brain that Silvestro might have seen Wendela's bete noire—the Syndicate's bete noire—at Cap Martin.

Patchinka was still known at the Pension Rossi as "Mess Smith;" but Silvestro could hardly have associated Laurette's strange young visitor with the Cap. He had perhaps even forgotten her; but Maroni's description of Sacha Kapiha's sister must have excited his curiosity if not his suspicions. He must instantly have identified her as the girl who had got into the garden with the two singers one morning several weeks ago. He must have wondered what she had wanted with Laurette, since Kapiha was dead. If Maroni was questioned about Patchinka he would invent some tale favourable to himself, detrimental to us. She and her "fellow plotter" would be presented to Silvestro as threatening Miss Horden and her friends in some under-hand way.

It was just at this point that my information became definite. I learned, later, how Silvestro exclaimed aloud in Italian: "Ah, at last I understand why this young savage wished to get at the Marquesa! She had heard about the secret of the Persian water-garden. Her hope was to worm the truth out of the poor, demented lady!"

Of course Maroni snapped greedily at this spicy tit-bit. And from there on I needed no longer to strain my imagination after details. They were all supplied to me!

CHAPTER XXXV.

The Persian Garden.

MARONI and Silvestro were talking in the bar of the Sporting Club: and by a stroke of luck for me the waiter in attendance was one of Viale's, the carpenter's men.

He was in the habit of snatching a few hours' sleep when his day's work in the Condamine was over and being aroused by his wife, would prepare in haste for after-midnight duty as a waiter in the Club bar. Freshly shaved, his rough hair sleek, unrecognisable by anyone who saw him only by day, and he could earn as much in one night, if tipping was good, as in half a week at Viale's "shop." He, however, recognised Maroni: and his wits being sharpened by the exciting feud between the Turinese and the cabinet-maker, pricked up his ears at mention of Kapiha's aeroplane.

Hovering about with cocktails, caviare sandwiches and cigarettes, the man managed to pick up several interesting items. If he had passed them on to me next day at the hangar, he would have found it worth the trouble. But he being unexpectedly upon another job, I had left Miss Wellington in charge there before he was able to get off, and report the overheard conversation.

In reply to Maroni's eager questioning, Silvestro entered into explanations. It was rumoured, he said, that the Marquesa and Marquese had, at the beginning of the War, or just before its outbreak, hidden a great store of petrol in this garden, for the use of enemy submarines, their sympathies being Austrian. The French police, (Silvestro understood) had made a night search, but in vain: and the existence of the cache was never proved. He—Silvestro—and the Marquese being intimate friends, the doctor had once ventured to ask if there were any (innocent) foundation for the slander. Then di Fiumine had let Silvestro into his confidence. He had never bought or stored petrol at Cap Martin or anywhere else. But just before his internment, in 1914, he had received an anonymous communication. It informed him that "something queer was going on in the grounds of the Villa Persane." A Persian water-garden was being hastily made, with blue tiles in red cement. Under this, the writer believed that many tins of essence were stored, in a cache, the work having been done secretly at night. A letter to Madame signed "Sacah," asking about the safe arrival of essence had been seen, the anonymous correspondent went on. Certain details given led the Marquese to imagine that this person must be a servant employed in the Villa. He would have travelled at once to Cap Martin in order to surprise his wife, but had been caught in the midst of his Austrian "curs," and interned for the "duration."

Maroni was greatly excited by this patchwork story told by the doctor from Turin. The two agreed that the cache was probably intact to this day, the water-garden (Silvestro said) never having been disturbed. True, the Marquese had returned after his release, but only for a short time, and to him the essence for itself had been of no importance. All he cared for was the conduct of his wife, and whatever that had been, he now attributed it to insanity.

It was very different, however, with Maroni. To him the essence, (if any) was of supreme importance! Miss Kapiha, he was sure, had been plotting all along to find and annex the contents of this cache. It was clear now why Malet had calmly gone on with his preparations for passenger flights, in the face of warnings that there would be no petrol to be obtained anywhere.

Work on the Kapiha biplane was practically finished now, Marni explained to Silvestro, and there was no time to waste if the cache were to be protected from this unscrupulous couple. He proposed that he and Silvestro should go at once to Cap Martin and make sure that the water-garden was still unharmed. If so, a watchman must guard it through the night, and early next morning gardeners ought to begin letting out the water. Underneath, no doubt, there must be a trap door, camouflaged with tiles; and this once discovered the store of essence was at the disposition of the finder.

As he talked, Maroni waxed more and more enthusiastic, Silvestro (who hadn't long since arrived in the Club for his night's amusement) hardly kept pace with him. It was only when Maroni offered at high price for the petrol, if found, that he consented to leave without even a look at the baccarat tables. He did then consent, however, and the pair went out of the Club together.

Luckily for us, it was Guiseppe whom Silvestro ordered to watch throughout the remaining dark hours. The young footman, roused from sleep obeyed sulkily. He did not know why the Persian water-garden had to be watched, but resolved to inform the "Signorina" at the Pension Rossi as soon as possible, of what was going on.

He was not able to get away—as he had hoped—in the morning, for in those post-war times there were not enough gardeners on hand to do the demolishing as quickly as Maroni and Co. wanted it done. Guiseppe, being young and strong, was commanded to assist. He was placated by the offer of extra wages, and perhaps greed and curiosity together resigned him to the inevitable.

The Persian garden contained a large body of water. It consisted of a deep pool at each end, above and below. Between these were shallow, tile-lined tanks, laid on different levels, so that from each a miniature cascade flowed to the level below, until the square pool at the bottom, with a group of fountains in the midst, was reached. It took a long time to get rid of all this water, and it had to be got rid of, because it was impossible to guess on which level was the entrance to the cache.

Doubtless Silvestro questioned his patient, but she had had a sleeping draught the night before as usual, and was, apparently too drowsy to give useful information. It was late afternoon before the bedding of blue tiles was clear on all levels, and even then some water remained which had not been drained out of the deep pool at the bottom. Luckily for Silvestro, a feature of the Persian garden was its electric lighting. There were numerous coloured glass bulbs, placed among flowers on the edge of the tanks, therefore the work could go on after dark.

It did go on, but for a few minutes without the assistance of Guiseppe. He contrived to slip off the Pension Rossi about half past five p.m. and report to Patchinka. Why the water-garden was being destroyed he could not tell: but the girl didn't need to be told. She knew that Silvestro had heard about the cache and was seeking it. She saw that it would hardly be worth his while to do this, unless the thing we feared had happened. He had met Maroni and one of them had brought up the subject of the hidden essence!

It was published less than a year ago and already thousands and thousands of babies are being brought up in accordance with its sensible, motherly and scientific advice.

From title page to index it is a text book pure and simple. The wonderful, helpful, reassuring first chapter is on preparing for Baby; the second, on furnishing the nursery; and then chapter after chapter it counsels on each and every problem which might puzzle young mothers—food, clothing, the bath, habits, first aids.

Aunt Belle has had many years of experience in bringing up her own babies and in extensive clinical and hospital work. She is a recognized national authority on baby culture.

It is a substantial book, bound in stiff board covers, printed on fine coated paper and beautifully illustrated—such a book as you would gladly pay two dollars for. But because we want the friendship of every mother in Canada, we will gladly mail one copy to each for 35 cents.

Aunt Belle, of course, advises that Mennen Borated Talcum should be used on babies, because she knows it is absolutely pure, mildly antiseptic, essential to Baby's health and happiness and has been thought highly of by three generations of mothers, nurses and doctors.

She also lays great stress on the wonderful virtue of Kora-Konia for prickly heat, chafing, baby rashes and all skin irritations. You really must learn about Kora-Konia, for nothing like it has ever been produced for the skin troubles of babies and adults.

"Wanted—A Plain Stenographer"

Was it just two days ago? It seemed ages and ages ago, and Marjorie felt as old as her wig.

"Good morning, Miss Chester," said Kent, seeing her only as "Miss Chester" and Marjorie knew she was safe.

Dictation started in the usual way, but as Kent paused between letters he showed a more personal interest in his stenographer than he ever had before, by asking,

"Did you have a good week-end, Miss Chester?"

Marjorie was almost afraid to answer, but managed to say primly,

"Yes, thank you, did you?"

Kent leaned back in his chair and said in an embarrassed way, "I had the best week-end I ever had," but his eyes glowed at the thought of it.

Marjorie kept her eyes on her book and her head lowered, but she could feel the hot blood creep up her neck and spread over her face. She had her book and pencil ready, and although Kent reached for another letter, he did not start to dictate, and Marjorie could feel his eyes upon her. She was at last forced to look up. Kent was sitting forward in his chair, staring, apparently, at her ear.

Marjorie's eyes widened with terror. Surely he hadn't recognized her. She had had to dress in a hurry and she felt that something must be wrong. Her hand crept up to her ear. Instead of feeling the smooth primness of her grey wig, she could feel some short ends and by squinting round at it she could see that it was her own dark hair. In her haste to adjust the wig she knocked her glasses off, and poor Marjorie dropped her book and ran for the door, but Kent was there before her, and catching her by the arm he snatched off the grey wig.

"Marjorie, little Marjorie, whatever does this mean?"

Marjorie's courage left her entirely, and she covered her face with her hands and sobbed, and as Kent's arms went round her she sobbed harder than ever.

"It means that I am your elderly stenographer, and your fellow-guest at Dale's all in one," she managed to say. "You advertised for an old and plain stenographer, and I couldn't seem to get a start because I had no experience. So, I dressed up and applied here. Please let me go, I suppose I am fired now."

Kent did not take his arms away, but held her closer, bending his head to lay his cheek against the soft silkiness of her hair.

"You certainly are fired; but there's another position vacant that only you can fill, dear heart," and as Marjorie's arms crept shyly round his neck, and the look of tenderness in the brown eyes as she smiled at him through her tears seemed to be proof enough for Kent that the position would be filled.

Peeking Into Houses

with my fingers, but did not disturb them, for I already knew their color was a greyish white.

There was a clump of white lilacs beside a fence near here, which I am almost as fond of as are the honey-bees. In June I made the discovery that someone else was fond of white lilacs—a ruby-throated humming-bird had built a nest there. I had seen the ruby-throat darting about, day after day, but had not suspected that her home was there.

A visit to the lilacs one morning, however, brought Master Ruby-throat darting, humming, and twittering angrily about my head. I at once began to search for the nest, which I now knew could not be far away. It was not long until I discovered the humming-bird's little home. It was built upon a lilac stem, well hidden amongst the leaves. A finely woven, carefully made, little cup of threads drawn from leaves and grasses, cobwebs and mosses, with shells like decorations of silver-grey lichen over the outside. Within the nest were two tiny eggs, tiny eggs in keeping with the smallness of the little home-nest.

I have found the home of the Brownies. They are the oddest, little fellows, and they have the oddest, little tree-house. The Brownies are the Tree Creepers, the little brown birds that one may see, summer and winter, climbing and circling tree trunks, always hunting their insect-dinners.

The Brownie, whose nest I discovered, was clinging to the side of a large, old stump. Knowing how tame all Brownies are, I approached the stump quietly, but openly, and I was so near that I could have caught the little fellow in my hand. Packed in behind the loose bark of the old stump, I found the Brownie nest, a cleverly woven basket of roots, moss, and bark-shreds. There were no eggs in the nest as yet, but I knew that there soon would be white eggs with cinnamon-brown specks on them.

For many years a family of Bald Eagles have made their home at the far end of a forest-covered point by one of our great lakes. I saw the nest, it is true, but from a distance. It could be seen quite plainly, a rough, large nest of sticks and dead branches, high on the top of one of the largest of the pine trees. The climb would have been too great a task for me, and I had to take the description of the nest from a lad who had climbed that big pine tree and peeked into the nest when the Highfliers were on the wing, away from home. I was informed that a new nest was built each year, and that the two white eggs now cared for by the old eagles would hatch out sturdy chicks, a noisy and hungry nestful.

This nest-house hunting is one of the most interesting ways of adding to one's store of outdoor knowledge, and to give it an added attraction, I shall take a camera with me, to bring back souvenirs of my visits, without having to rob my feathered friends of their eggs.

and spoons, last fall. Nobody reminded them of their change of heart—we were all so glad of it!

It is good for the children, and while it may be sometimes a little awkward to spare the milk when Sammy brings home the pail, still we mothers are free from the daily worry over what we are to put in the sandwiches. It depends most of all on the teacher, this scheme—next, on the mothers. As for saying "It is up to the trustees—" What nonsense! Their chief desire is to carry out the wish of the section. So there you are! They may oppose while they misunderstand, but once make it clear to them, reasonably, and they will help in every way. They always do.

In answer to a letter from his bank calling his loan, a wealthy California rancher wrote this letter: "For the following reasons I am unable to send you the check asked for: I have been held up, held down, sandbagged, walked on, flattened out, and squeezed dry, first by the government, state, and county, for Federal war tax, excess profit tax, merchant's license and auto tax, and then by every society and organization that the inventive mind can invent to extract what I may or may not possess. I have contributed to the Society of John the Baptist, the G. A. R., K. of C., X. Y. Z., the Woman's Relief, the Navy League, the Red Cross, the Purple Cross, the Double Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Boy Scouts, the Jewish Relief and every hospital in town. Then on top of it all came the Associated Charities and the Society for the Suppression of Useless Giving. The government has so governed my business that I don't know who owns it. I am inspected, suspected, examined, reexamined, informed, required and commanded, so I don't know who I am, where I am, or why I am. All I know is that I am supposed to be an inexhaustible supply of money for every known need, desire, or hope of the human race; and because I will not sell all I have and go out and beg, borrow, and steal money to give away, I have been cursed, discussed, boycotted, talked to, talked about, lied to, lied about, held up, hung up and robbed. And the only reason I am clinging to life is to see what is coming next."

"I WAS thinking about the Baby" said the Motorman. It all happened in a certain Canadian city on the first real Summer Sunday Morning this year. So warm was the air that it might have been Midsummer. We were all in a street car, only half-a-dozen passengers or so of us, and it was five minutes past eleven. And we had made the usual stop at a junction point. At the left of this intersection, within easy hail of the Motorman, stood two young Canadian women. One of them had a little baby in her arms—a new baby—held as only a mother can hold it. The baby must have been quite new, for you could not see much of it, except its white, woolly, soft, fluffy shawl. The Motorman was not tall, but nature had made that up to him by giving him a squareness and sturdiness of build that few tall people possess. He was a man of weight. His shoulders were broad enough for two: he wore a new uniform and a real moustache. And he had been, not many years before, a New Canadian. But now he was a real Canadian without any adjective or hyphen or anything else—just Canadian.

about the Baby. Not with vain regret and useless tears as Mrs. Gummidge was seen by Charles Dickens—"Thinking about the old'un." But with some perception and with some resolution.

CHILDREN'S NEEDS

What does Canada ask for her children? She asks that their needs should be supplied. Canada wants her children to have every chance to grow up to be God's Own Canadians. The ideal way is that the parents should be able to supply all that is needed for this in their own home, and no Canadian wants to decrease parental responsibility. But the organization of human society is not yet perfect, though it is very complex, and parents cannot always give their children what they need.

THE NATION'S PART

Besides, we are living not in primitive isolation, like the Cave Man, but in communities and nations. The nation and the community have duties and responsibilities too, and every Canadian must

At a Child Welfare Gathering Belleville, Ontario.

Thus spoke the Motorman, leaning over his left-hand open window, to the group of three—"Say, Lady! Dem H. St. cars don't run down here on Sundays." This certain Canadian city is one of the places where they change the Sunday routes, (and quite right), to give more employees their Sunday. Disconcerting to wait for a car that isn't going to come till to-morrow. The Motorman knew, and so did the ladies, that this car was the best one they could get. Rapid movement on the part of the two young women. No difference to the Baby. In the safest, steadiest, and sweetest resting place on earth, the Baby slept on. Seven weeks old the Baby was, so the Mother said. A nice Baby. Nice, red-faced, healthy baby.

"You're a kind man," said the Family Physician to the Motorman on leaving the car. And the Motorman laughed and said by way of apology—"I was thinking about the Baby."

CHILD WELFARE

Thinking about the Baby is a favourite occupation just now. We are all thinking

CHILDREN IN THE HOME.

No one needs to be told what a large part of the home is made by the children. What is Home without Children! Their interests, their needs and their very existence help to make the foundation of the Home, and therefore of the Nation. What do they need?

LIFE AND HEALTH

Preventive Medicine—School Hygiene—Vital Statistics and every other branch of medical work have slowly discovered and driven into the National Consciousness the truth that many of our children do not grow as well or weigh as much, or breathe as well or see as well, or hear as distinctly as they should. Vital Statistics prove to us by name and date and place that out of every thousand children born in Canada, about one hundred, on an affect the smile—teeth freed from film

How Pretty Teeth

See what one week will do

The open smile comes naturally when there are pretty teeth to show. But dingy teeth are kept concealed.

The difference lies in film. That is what stains and discolors. That is what hides the tooth luster. Let us show you, by a ten-day test, how millions now fight that film.

Why teeth are dim

Your teeth are coated with a viscous film. You can feel it now. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays.

No ordinary tooth paste can effectively combat it. The tooth brush, therefore, leaves much of it intact.

That film is what discolors, not the teeth. It often forms the basis of a dingy coat. Millions of teeth are clouded in that way.

The tooth attacks

Film also holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Germ constantly breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to film, and very few people escape them.

Must be combated

Dental science has long been seeking a daily film combatant. In late years two effective methods have been found. Authorities have proved them by many careful tests. Now leading dentists nearly all the world over are urging their daily use.

A new-day tooth paste has been perfected, made to comply with modern requirements. The name is Pepsodent. These two great film combatants are embodied in it.

It goes further

Other effects are now considered essential. Pepsodent is made to bring them all.

It multiplies the salivary flow. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits on teeth, so they will not remain and form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's neutralizer for acids which cause decay.

Thus every application gives these tooth-protecting forces multiplied effect.

These things mean whiter, cleaner, safer teeth. They mean natural mouth conditions, better tooth protection. This ten-day test will convince you by what you see and feel. Make it for your own sake, then decide what is best.

The Idol of Youth

For a moment she thought we had lost the game. These men must know for certain that the petrol was concealed somewhere under those blue tiles, or they wouldn't be tearing them up in such fierce haste. But Guiseppe ventured respectfully to encourage the young lady. If the signor Doctor actually knew something about the garden, why didn't he know all? Guiseppe ventured to believe that Silvestro was acting on mere hearsay—trying to find out what he did not know. As for the Marquesa, the adventure of her escape might be more easily accomplished, instead of rendered impossible, as Patchinka had feared at first. The attention of everyone was now concentrated upon the Persian water-garden. Only the Signor's maid had much thought to spare for the poor lady at present. Guiseppe hoped that this might be the night when he could give the signal.

Patchinka began her walk along the wooded road past the villa that evening at six thirty. This was according to her habit of late, but her heart was not beating according to habit. It pounded in her side, and set her blood tingling. Twice, three times, she passed the wrought-iron gates, and the tower was still dark. But sauntering by for the fourth time, almost discouraged, there was the dim gleam she had looked for so long in vain. Guiseppe had placed a lighted candle in the window. Even as she looked, it was gone. He had not dared leave it for many moments. Something had alarmed him—perhaps a sound on the tower stairs.

Patchinka ran back to the Pension Rossi, telephoned to the Restaurant Suisse in the Condamine that one word "Come" and was ready for the next act on her programme.

The villa Persane had a small gate for tradesmen and servants. Like the great gate, it was always kept locked, its bell being answered from the lodge when anyone wished to enter. No servant had a key of his or her own, but was let out and admitted again by the lodge-keeper or his wife: but the pair were Italians, and Guiseppe—a handsome boy—had curried favour with the woman. He had been able to borrow a key of the side gate on his "day out" a short time ago, and had had two duplicates made in Mentone. One he kept: the other was for Patchinka. It was only three days ago this key had come into the girl's possession, and she had often feared to see the signal before she had a sure means of responding to it. Now, however, she was safe in that regard. Dressed in black, small and light of foot, though weighed down by a huge parcel which she carried, Patchinka slipped through the tradesmen's gate while the pair at the lodge, not far off, ate their evening meal close to a lighted window.

The girl had good reason to know, since her first adventure in the grounds, the room on the ground floor of the villa, occupied by the Marquesa. She knew also that the room adjoining, untenanted then, had now been given to the guardian-maid by Doctor Silvestro.

Laurette's was a corner room. The principal window looked over the Pension garden, where an army of men were hard at work by electric light, but there was another long window at the side. It was from this direction that Patchinka arrived, stealthily and shadowlike as a rat d'hotel.

The curtains were not yet drawn. Standing in a border of night-scented stocks, the girl peeped into the room through a mass of hanging anemones which framed and partly screened the glass.

Laurette was in bed. The maid was moving about. Presently she flitted into her own room, and after three or four minutes returned with a medicine glass on a tray. During the time of her absence, however, Laurette had turned on her side, her face to the wall, and had apparently gone to sleep. This gave Patchinka a thrill of hope. Laurette knew from Guiseppe that there was to be an attempt at rescue. She seemed to be playing the game!

But, could she be depended upon to carry it through? Just at that instant, —the right instant, the planned instant—came the fluttering roar of a hydro aeroplane.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Patchinka at the Window.

PATCHINKA could have shouted in sheer happiness: yet she was suddenly afraid.

Would the maid be alarmed at the sound? Would Laurette frighten her by some cry or movement of surprise?

But Laurette lay very still. She was being splendid. Or—but Patchinka would not think of the worst.

The maid did start slightly, hearing the noise. She even went to the window (not the one overlooking the Persian garden but that directly facing the sea view)—and peeped out. Apparently she saw nothing which gave her furiously to think. She drew the curtains, but luckily left a wide chink through which Patchinka could spy. Next, she jerked heavy velvet folds across the second window as well, still holding the tray in one hand. Then at last she went to the bedside, but seeing that her mistress appeared to be fast asleep, she hesitated an instant, shrugged her shoulders and placed the tray on a small table within easy reach.

"What will she do now?" wondered Patchinka, while the sound of the seaplane lessened in distance, then increased again.

What the woman did was to go out of the room, not into her own, but through a door which opened into a lighted corridor.

Patchinka would have given much to know whether she meant to amuse herself by a chat with the workmen in the brightly lit garden, or whether she was merely bent on fetching the Marquesa's dinner. But it was early for that. She was sure to stop for a gossip with someone, the girl thought.

Laurette seemed to think the same: or else the sound of the aeroplane, prayed for so long, made her reckless. To Patchinka's joy, she threw back the bedclothes and sat up. Hurrah! she had put on the gown smuggled in by Guiseppe! Down slid a pair of small feet to the floor: they wore stockings and shoes. Under the pillows was bundled the hooded cloak bought by Patchinka at a Mentone shop. Laurette had flung off a tulle boudoir cap, was pulling the hood over her long braids of yellow hair, and fastening the buckle at her throat. (How loud was the noise of the water-plane now! It came like a call. Even to Patchinka it cried: "Make haste! I am here. I wait!")

The girl hesitated no longer. She tapped loudly on the window pane. The French sashes were closed, and she had heard from Guiseppe how, since the day of her first stolen visit, this window and the other were kept locked, only the ventilators at the top being open to give air. But she knew that, as Guiseppe had accomplished so much, he would not have failed to loosen one of those locks with a screw driver, as he had promised to do.

Yes, he had kept that promise! Laurette came running to the window, pulled back the curtains, and after an effort (aided by Patchinka with a push) wrenched the sashes apart. Though she had heard the knock, she seemed surprised and deeply disappointed at sight of the small figure in black, which she did not recognise.

"Only a girl!" she exclaimed. "I thought—I thought he had come at last, to take me away."

"Someone is in the seaplane, waiting for you. I am Sacha's sister," Patchinka temporized as best she could.

The Idol of Youth

Laurette accepted the explanation. "Then take me to him quickly," she said. "They're driving me mad here. I'm not quite mad yet—at least I think not. But soon I shall be. That's what they wish. Why don't we start?"

"I've just one thing to do first," Patchinka said. "We want them to think you're asleep, or they may follow you too soon."

As she spoke, she unwrapped the great parcel she had brought. It was the big, almost life-sized doll I had won in the lottery—our hated "Wendela" which the Iron Duke had carried away for some mysterious purpose. Now, the girl came into the room with it, while Laurette hovered outside the window, eager to get off. The doll was dressed in a delicate nightdress of the Marquesa's, which Guiseppe had cleverly stolen out of the laundry basket the week before. Patchinka covered its head with the boudoir cap just discarded by Laurette, slipped the figure into bed, pulled down the coverlet up to its neck, turned its face to the wall, and fluffed the golden hair over an up-turned face. The size of the head was increased by the bunched curls inside the lace cap; and in the soft light of the purple shaded bed lamp, the illusion was perfect enough to deceive a totally unsuspecting person, at a distance. Of course the doll would betray our complicity in the end. But we had our own reasons for indifference to that fact.

"Hurrah for Wendela!" the girl said to herself, as she drew the curtains, sprang down among the sweet-smelling stocks, and pulled the window shut.

For an instant she stood still there, holding Laurette by the hand. Through the "tch-tch-tch" of the hydro-aeroplane, could be heard the sound of many pick-axes.

"They're working late in your Persian garden," she told the Marquesa. "We mustn't go where they can catch sight of us. They're digging up the tiles, trying to find the essence, and we can't get it anywhere unless from you."

"No, it's not there," answered Laurette. "When the essence came—Sacha sent it to me, you know!—there was a servant in the house I didn't trust—always spying on me. I had the water-garden made on purpose to deceive him. But the essence is hidden in the Dragon's Hole down by the sea. I'll take you to it now. There's a quiet way. We needn't pass the Persian garden."

"But we can't go through your place," Patchinka said. "They've fastened up the way that leads to the Coastguards' path. Can we get out through the tradesmen's gate, and then down to the Moorish pavilion on the shore? We could get to the beginning of the Coastguards' path there, and perhaps you could show me—"

"Yes—yes, we can do that," Laurette broke in. "Only it is a long way round. We'll have to get back to the rocks below the grounds of my villa. The Dragon's Hole is close by our private harbour, you know."

Patchinka did know that one of the many miniature caves honeycombing the red and grey rocks of the Cap was called the "Dragon's Hole," or "La Dragonniere." At the Pension she had heard an old legend concerning it, and had laughed because to this day, peasant mothers frightened their children indoors at sunset, whispering that the Dragon would come and catch them. Once the cave had been a "blow hole" but the noise had disturbed the ex-Empress Eugenie; and—so the girl understood—the opening had been filled up or screened with stones.

Patchinka smiled with joy because the cache of petrol was safe from Silvestro and the Syndicate—at least for the moment. She rejoiced that the stuff was within easy reach of the sea, and so near the little private harbour of the Villa Persane that it could perhaps be taken out to the seaplane in a few journeys, by the boat from the Marquesa's boat house which Rossi would row. She might have guessed, she thought, that the story of the cache under the water-garden was nonsense! But who would have thought of the filled-in "blow hole"? Maybe, (she told herself quickly) the filling in wasn't so solid and serious an affair as it had seemed.

The girl had ordered Guiseppe to open the locked boat-house in the little harbour, at all costs, even if he had to smash the doors; because the seaplane could not enter the harbour, and it had been necessary for Laurette's escape to have a boat at her disposal. Rossi, from the Pension, was supposed to be at hand ready to row Patchinka and her charge out to the waiting Water Baby; and now the girl prayed he might be there not only for that purpose but for another as well. It would be gorgeous to make sure that the cache was really where Laurette said it was, and still intact.

The two slipped like shadows to the servants' gate, and out. So along the moonlit road, though not fast enough to please Patchinka, for Laurette was weak. But soon they reached the turn that led down to the sea-level, and near the Moorish Tea Pavilion belonging to the Grand Hotel. There began the ascent of the rough narrow way known as the Coastguards' path. Patchinka wound an arm round the waist of Laurette, and helped her on, encouraging her at every step with cheery words. It was not necessary to deceive the poor creature, even for her own good. She took it pathetically for granted that in the seaplane she heard, whirring and roaring, she would find Sacha Kapieha. Except for believing him alive, she seemed sane, and even though it would be grief to meet a stranger instead of the man she had so loved, at least it would be a rescuer. It was this fact with which Patchinka soothed her conscience. She was trying to save Laurette from a fate worse than death. But—could she save her? Would they reach the harbour, and would the boat be ready to row away from land before the hue and cry was out?

Which brings the tangled skein to me, riding the tiny waves in the Water Baby, and wondering whether my meagre supply of petrol was going to see me through the whole adventure.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

The Cache

WELL, it was true about the Dragon's Hole!

We didn't make sure of this for ourselves, Patchinka and I, until we had placed the Marquesa in a place of safety. This we did (when Rossi of the Pension had rowed Laurette and the girl from the little private harbour out to the Water Baby) by flying back to the seaplane's hangar. Not far off lived Viale; in one of those big, bourgeois apartment houses which are like respectable boxes. The ground floor flat on one side the door was his: that on the opposite side was occupied by his mother-in-law, who had room for a lodger. I had already arranged for an "invalid lady" to be accommodated there, and Madame Viale had engaged a nurse, who for three days had been awaiting the arrival of her patient.

This was to be but a temporary shelter, of course; and I meant, as soon as we had freed Laurette to hand her over to a skilled doctor at Monte Carlo who would be told the story of her persecution and virtual imprisonment. Enquiries I had quietly made had put me into touch with just the right man, I thought, and there was no danger that di Fiumine or Silvestro could succeed in getting her back again.

By seaplane (even a poor, out of date Water Baby) the journey from Cap Martin to Monaco Port can be done in about three minutes, or four at most. From the hangar to Viale's apartment house we had to walk with the dazed and tremulous Laurette; but even so we were not ten minutes on the way. Ten minutes more for soothing words, and promises on Patchinka's part to return; five minutes trot back to the hangar average, all over the Dominion, die before they are a year old. Canadian Infant Mortality is about one hundred (New Zealand Infant Mortality is about fifty). These lives could be saved and these defects could be prevented by proper care given to the Mother and Child. All of them saved? No, not quite all. But the greater part could. And when we have saved half these lives, and got our Infant Mortality down to 50, we shall probably know a good deal more about how to save the other fifty lives.

HOW TO DO IT

How can it be done? Put the skill, knowledge and good-will of our Doctors and Nurses within reach of those who need them. Mobilize the resources of the community to redress the balance of the children's fate, so that they shall live and not die. We need some community organization to do this. We cannot do it singly any more than we can build our roads, our sewers, our houses and our waterworks with our own two hands.

THE M. O. H.

Who is the Director of the Organization? The Medical Officer of Health. He has a great deal of the work done already, and he only needs to increase here, and develop there, and construct, and persuade, and inspire, and lead. But it all depends on you and the Motorman, Dear Reader. You are the private soldier and the M. O. H. is your General. It takes the General and the Officers, non-commissioned officers, and private soldiers to make an Army. There is no discharge in this War. Canada is a civilized nation. And no civilized nation lets its Mothers and children die. We must save them alive. If this is your will and pleasure, tell your servants in the nation and the community to carry it out.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH NURSE

The best person yet discovered to do this work is the Public Health Nurse, acting as the assistant of a physician. And the place where the work can best be done is a convenient centre—two or more homelike rooms, with some simple, comfortable furniture, and the necessary equipment—not too much, and nothing to frighten anybody.

THE CHILDREN'S CLINIC

Such a place is called a "Babies' Centre," or a "Children's Clinic," or some such name. It will be described more fully in our August Number. Meantime there are two points you might think over. First, the success of the Clinic will depend on the kind of Doctor and Nurse you have. If they are A1, the Clinic will be A1. If they are C3, the Clinic will be C3. Second, You can't do everything for everybody at the same place and at the same time. It is Well Babies you want—to keep them well. Take the Sick Babies to the Hospital where they will be made well.

A post-war French story of hotel exigencies is as follows: A motorer through Touraine complained at petit déjeuner about his coffee. It did not taste like coffee. He told the waiter, "It has a kind of cocoa taste." The waiter smelled and sampled the beverage. He was covered with contrition. "I'm sorry, sir. A most unfortunate mistake. I've brought you tea."

On the occasion of her hundredth birthday the village centenarian received a visit from the vicar. Being anxious to hear from her own lips what she considered had been the source of her strength and sustenance, he said: "My dear Mrs. Adams, pray tell me, in order that I may tell to others, what has been the secret of your longevity?" The vicar waited with unusual eagerness for the old lady's reply, but he was hardly prepared for it when it came. "Victuals!" she answered.

Anecdotal

One of the most frequently quoted arguments against prohibition is that it is hard on dope fiends. Not being able to take an occasional holiday from drugs with booze, the drug fiend is rapidly going to pieces. Prohibition Commissioner Haynes said at a luncheon in New York: "Well, now, if prohibition is hard on the drug fiends I'm sorry, for I don't want to be hard on anybody. But, friends, did you ever look at a drug fiend—his shifty eye, his lax mouth, his receding chin? It is hard to look at a drug fiend without repeating in utter discouragement the old Chinese proverb: 'Rotten wood can not be carved.'"

Judge Oscar Hallam in his address before the South Dakota Bar Association told this good one: "I recall a case of assault and battery against the Koltski family, and in the course of the examination it developed that the Koltski family

Ben Turpin's press agent is said to be responsible for a story that the comedian's admirers enjoy, whether it is true or not. Turpin approached the teller of a strange bank with a check to be cashed. The teller did not recognize him. Such is fame! "Have you any way to identify yourself?" asked the non-movie-attending teller. "Sure," replied Ben, and he became cross-eyed and did his great film fall. "Now, do you know me?" he asked confidently. "No," answered the teller, "but here's your money. You have earned it."

dog had taken an active part. Mrs. Koltski, when on the stand, was asked if she didn't instigate the activities of the dog. She insisted that she did not. The attorney said, "Didn't you say, 'Sic 'em, Caesar'?" for that was the dog's name. She said, "No, I did not." The attorney said, "You said something to the dog?" She replied, "Well, what if I did?" He insisted: "Tell us what you said to the dog." She answered, "Why, I said, 'Don't sic 'em, Caesar.'"

A rural minister was bothered by the postman not only reading his postcards, but communicating their information to others. One day he wrote a postcard to a medical friend who lived at the other end of the village. It read, "I would tell you more only I know the postman will read it." Then he put the card in the letter-box, whence it was collected, and taken to the postoffice and sent out for snob, has lost some of his old-time finesse. A profiteer was lunching at Claridge's the other day, and preparatory to the ordeal had knotted his napkin about his neck. The waiter hurried forward with a wink to the more knowing patrons and inquired in a carrying voice, "Haircut or shave, sir?"

A Pittsburgh bellboy is credited with an ingenious method for calling sleepy guests. A man leaving instructions to be called early is awakened on the following morning with a loud tattoo on the door. In answer to the sleepy guest's inquiry the bellhop answers, "I have a message for you, sir." The usual reaction is for the sleepy one to jump, however reluctantly, out of bed, stumblingly reach the door, and grab the envelope tendered him. The message, of course, reads, "It is time to get up."

The Idol of Youth

where I picked up a coil of rope; the last of the Baby's petrol poured into her, in haste: a wet rush to Cap Martin again: Rossi waiting: and you can see that the whole adventure hadn't taken half an hour.

It was a toss-up whether or no Laurette's escape had been discovered. She'd been feigning sleep when her maid went out; and it wasn't likely that the woman would hurry over the task of fetching dinner. In any case, even if the alarm had been given, Silvestro wouldn't connect his patient's disappearance with the noise of a hydro-plane. Rossi, sitting in the boat within the harbour, had seen no one, heard no sounds of pursuit during our absence; and we prepared to make the best of our time—such time as might be granted.

Laurette, whose sole delusion (so far as we'd discovered) was a belief that Sacha lived, had described to me quite lucidly how the petrol was concealed. I'd asked no question, till she was safely housed in the flat at Monaco; but a few words had been enough to make me understand.

The small cave or "blow hole" had been already filled up, to please the ex-Empress, before she—Laurette—and Sacha conceived the idea of storing petrol for seaplane trips. At night, some of the stones were removed by Laurette's orders, tins of petrol replacing them, and the cache concealed, not with bits of rock (which would have let in water) but a door so well camouflaged with imitation stones on its surface, that none save those in the secret would ever have suspected the trick.

The tiny steel key of this door was hidden inside a Russian Cross, on a bracelet which Laurette wore by day and night. She gave it to me, believing—poor soul!—that "Sacha wanted it." An electric torch brought by Patchinka showed me the keyhole after a little search, when I had climbed out of the boat on to the grey, red-scarred rocks. The iron door, with its false stones of painted cement opened easily, though six years or more had passed since the making of the cache. Once more the torch was in requisition. I crawled into a dank-smelling hole, and saw behind a screen of pebbles, a stack of five and two gallon tins with a well known label showing freshly upon them. There must have been, I calculated roughly, at least a hundred—not as many as rumour said, but a godsend for us. I could have kissed the tins! And I laughed aloud as I thought of Silvestro's men digging in the Persian garden!

Though the Mediterranean is called a "tideless sea," there is a rise and fall of about three feet, each four and twenty hours. Had our visit to the old "blow hole" been made in a storm, or even when the tide was high, I should have got a wetting, and the cave—when open to the sea—would have been flooded.

At present, all was safe; but we dared not trust to luck and leave any part of the store behind us in the cave. Silvestro and Co. might suspect that the Marquesa had escaped by boat and follow down to the harbour—which would mean a fight with the odds against us.

The three of us—Patchinka, Rossi and I—worked like pantomime demons. Four times we piled the boat with five-gallon tins, ten of which were all we could load on the Water Baby. You see, the weight of petrol would sink the plane in the water. In fact, the floats would be nearly submerged, especially the tail float, owing to the position of the drums down the fuselage. These could, however, be placed on the wings, two on each side of the cockpit, two more at the rear of the latter, and the remaining six Rossi and I disposed on each side of the fuselage. Here was where I made use of the rope I'd brought from the Aeroplane's hangar. We passed it through the handles of the cans, slinging them pannier fashion. Thus they were locked to the fuselage to prevent their rocking, for unsecured they might have endangered the fabric. The rest of the petrol Rossi would look after, and smuggle to Monte for me when he could, having fastened up the cave as before. Loaded thus, with the weight wrongly balanced as it had to be, I couldn't fly to Monaco, but was able to taxi back along the smooth surface of the sea, having reluctantly left Patchinka to be chaperoned by Rossi and the remaining essence.

Arrived at the Water Baby's modest bungalow, however, my heart quailed at the thought of abandoning my precious load there.

Not far off was that hive of activity where the Mascot was being transformed. Mendez, or some other member of the Syndicate, and a detective were always there. Until to-night nobody had guessed that I possessed a hydroaeroplane, or even that one was present in the adjacent hangar. But now, if anyone had noticed the noises and concerned himself about them I might be seen sneaking in or creeping out. It was even possible that I had been seen already: but, as on several occasions Viale was my sure refuge. His dislike of Mendez had been fortunate for us from the first. What he could do for me was done against Mendez: and now I recalled with pleasure the fact that he had a basement storehouse under his shop and place of business. There he kept furniture sent him for repair, and a hundred odds and ends. There, I hoped, he would also be keeping my petrol before I was many hours older; not only what I had brought to the port, but what Rossi would bring later in the night.

"Yes, I thought of it as my petrol now!"

I walked into the Mascot's hangar at eleven p.m. to relieve the Iron Duke, Petro and young Viale; also to see how work on the biplane was going on.

Although I hadn't slept a wink, and had eaten nothing more than a sandwich, I was so delighted with life in general that I felt—and probably looked—rested and well fed. Old Viale and I exchanged greetings as though we had not lately met on the strength of a note from myself delivered by the hand of his wife. If our eyes twinkled (as well they might, considering that the transfer of petrol had been effected between the hours of nine and ten) our gaiety was attributable to progress on the Mascot.

"In half an hour, Monsieur, I assure you, we can all fold our hands!" announced the fat cabinet maker. "I, myself, was called away for a time on important business (none knew this better than myself!) but my men have worked well. I think Monsieur will have no fault to find. And tomorrow, if he can provide himself with essence, he may depart with his important passengers."

Two of the "important passengers" were present, in the shape of Mendez and Maroni. The latter had lately arrived, if one could judge by flushed face and hurried breathing. I chuckled internally and wished that I had someone to bet with that he had blown in as a bearer of bad news.

"Splendid!" I answered Viale. "Each of your men shall have something from me to drink luck to the Mascot and her first peace-flight." Then I turned to Mendez. "You'll be glad to hear that I've contrived to wangle a little petrol," I said. "Nothing big, to write home about, maybe! But a matter of—well, over a hundred gallons at least, which will do all the work you want done, and more. Why, Senor Mendez, you don't look very jolly over the prospect of leaving Monte?"

"I shall look jolly," retorted Mendez, with the air of one about to weep, "when I'm sure (he said as nearly this as one can say it in French)—sure you're not pulling my leg."

"Far be it from me to take such a liberty," I replied. "I shouldn't dream of deceiving you. Monsieur Maroni are you as determined as ever not to trust yourself to an amateur?"

The Idol of Youth

"Quite as determined," he echoed, in a tone sharp enough to nip off my nose.

"Well, then," I said, "we shall have that comfortable chair behind the others in our beau-ti-ful cabin empty. Unless I can find someone else who wants to fly to Algeria and Spain tomorrow. For of course, we will go tomorrow. I suppose you and Monsieur Dupont are really as anxious to get off as ever, Senor Mendez?"

"Oh yes," returned the Spaniard. And my impression that he'd been hoping against hope not to get off at all, was confirmed. "We—Dupont and I—shall rejoice to be no longer idle. But—this sudden move is a surprise. We thought—feared—you could not beg, buy or steal any essence. We have not therefore finished our preparations. I will see Dupont. It may be we will find it more convenient to leave the day after tomorrow. Besides, to-morrow is Sunday. In some eyes it is not convenable to start such an expedition on a Dimanche."

I reflected for an instant, and then said "All right, Monday will suit me well enough; though of course it's my object to get back here as soon as I can and pick up other passengers I'm engaged to for a second trip."

I said this slowly, thinking as I spoke. In some ways, I should prefer to have all to-morrow at Monte Carlo, because of the Marquesa, who couldn't be left long in her present humble quarters. But, on the other hand, I guessed that Mendez was "up to something."

"So they hope to prove that Patchinka and I have kidnapped the Marquesa?" I wondered. "Do they think Silvestro can have us arrested, and that with us disposed of, they can get a free hand here with the biplane?"

It was possible that they hoped and thought this. But it struck me that Silvestro would dare do anything. Even if he wired the Marquesa there would be a long delay before the latter could appear upon the scene. Besides, would he appear? He was worse than unpopular in France. There might be a demonstration against him if he came. On the whole I thought myself safe in consenting to put off the flight for one more day.

Now that I look back from a little distance of this time, I wonder that I concentrated my suspicion wholly upon the Villa Persane. When Mendez and Maroni gave each other that glance, why didn't I think—but never mind! It's too late to hark back now, and blame my denseness of perception.

Even the fact that Maroni didn't show up to take his turn at the Hangar on Sunday told me nothing. I was too busy, too happy, to waste time wondering about him. It seemed to me that things were going well with us. Laurette had not been disturbed. Miss Wellington and Patchinka spent much time with her. I had found the right man to protect her interests. Success smiled on all our undertakings. I derived much joy from the use Patchinka had made of my hated doll. Every prospect pleased, and if man were vile, his vileness didn't, at the moment, interfere with us.

That was my attitude towards life up to the Sunday afternoon, when Miss Horden discovered that Patchinka was to be a pilot on board the Mascot.

Are you giving your hair the right treatment?

Different types of hair need different treatment to bring out their beauty and lustre—there is a tested treatment for your individual type of hair.

This is the danger signal. For Sebum, if neglected, becomes the chief source of harm to your hair. It clogs the roots—it stops the natural flow of this oil. Your hair becomes dry and brittle.

And this Sebum, if neglected, quickly decomposes, forming fatty acids, which inflame the scalp, burn away the tissue, and if left unattended to, generally kills the hair roots.

The first step is the same as with any skin surface. Remove the surplus, purge the pores and follicles.

But not with ordinary soaps and cleansers. For you must aim at the Sebum. You must remove it—dissolve it—clear it from your scalp, in a way that will not harm the delicate tissues.

Once the cause of hair trouble was known, our chemists began their search for an effective remedy.

They have developed in Palmolive Shampoo, we believe, the best way yet known to combat Sebum effectively.

The next thing is to care for your hair as you would your complexion, to bring out its beauty and lustre. Together with the Sebum combatant our chemists have blended Olive Oil. Nothing throughout the ages has yet proved the equal of Palm and Olive Oil for bringing out the lustre, sheen, and silky softness of your hair.

To show you the effectiveness of this shampoo treatment we will send you a treatment to try.

With it comes a book that tells you exactly what else to do for your own type of hair. In addition to Palmolive Special Shampoo treatment it tells you the other aids to give your hair—how to help you restore hair that is oily, dull and brittle, dry, full of dandruff, or thin and falling.

Each treatment has been tested by well-known medical authorities. The results have already been proven.

So, for your own sake, stop hit or miss methods. Adopt the Palmolive Shampoo, together with one of these tested treatments, that is right for your type of hair.

Then see how soon your friends begin to note the remarkable change and the softness and beauty of your hair.

If your hair is not all you want it to be, start today to learn the best way to beautify it and preserve it.

NATURE intended every woman to have beautiful hair—hair that is full of lights and lustre—hair that is soft and silky to touch.

This is a message to women who wish to keep this beauty or who would restore it.

For the cause of most all hair troubles is now known. And there is now an ideal method of treating your hair that deals directly with the cause of these troubles.

There is an oil in the scalp, secreted by the glands of the hair, called Sebum. It is nature's beautifier. It is this Sebum oil which gives your hair its natural beauty and lustre—when your hair is healthy.

But, like all skin secretions, its flow is often excessive. Then your hair becomes oily, or full of dandruff and later scales.

WHO can account for the whims of Fashion? Women don't attempt to. They simply accept them. And how quickly are those whims sensed and felt to be inevitable!

So the vogue of Florient Talc comes very naturally as an outcome of the present mode. The art of the Orient enriches every phase of Fashion's fancies. Oriental colorings and designs in costume call for "Flowers of the Orient" in the boudoir. Florient Talc best carries out the feeling of this art. Its perfume seems a very part of these costly fabrics.

The color too, is different, a warm Oriental tone, just off the white.

And again one senses another vogue—a new use of Florient Talc. For while it is fulfilling the duty of an after-the-bath powder, Florient Talc imparts a delicate fragrance that clings exquisitely about the woman using it—as a powdered perfume.

Pretty When She Wakes Up

This is the real test. The girl who wakes fresh and radiant, with a clear, smooth skin which has no defects to conceal, need not worry about her looks. She possesses the greatest of all attractions—the one which outshines all others.

This need not discourage the girl whose complexion is not so good. Proper care will soon transform a bad skin into one admired for its perfection.

Get rid of the clogging accumulations which cause coarseness and disfiguring defects and you will soon be complimented on your fresh, blooming complexion.

The secret is simple and about 3,000 years old. It was discovered in ancient Egypt and practiced by Cleopatra.

Simple—Beautifying

The remedy for a coarse skin, for one disfigured with blackheads or ugly blotches, is daily cleansing with a lather blended from palm and olive oils.

10c.

Such a cleanser is so mild and soothing that it softens the skin and keeps it smooth. But it removes the accumulation of dirt, oil and perspiration which are responsible for most bad complexions.

You can't neglect your skin and expect to keep it blooming and alluring. The powder and rouge you use to conceal defects deceive no one.

The Soothing Cleanser

Palmolive is the modern combination of the same beautifying cosmetic oils Cleopatra used in the days of ancient Egypt. It is just as valuable today as a safe, soothing cleanser.

Massage its smooth, creamy lather softly into the network of tiny pores which compose the surface of your skin. It will remove the clogging deposits which enlarge these pores, cause blackheads and invite blotches.

Dry skins are benefited by cold cream after cleansing. If unusual dryness is your trouble, apply a little cream before as well as after washing.

Popularity—Low Price

Judge Palmolive by other soaps and you will expect to pay at least 25 cents a cake. But the popularity which keeps the Palmolive factories working day and night naturally reduces cost. Quantity production is always economical.

Thus this finest facial soap is offered at 10 cents a cake—a price all can afford. You can economically use Palmolive for every toilet purpose, for it costs no more than ordinary soap.

Cleopatra's way

With a world of ancient beauty arts at her command, she depended on cleansing with palm and olive oils to protect, improve and preserve the freshness and smoothness of her skin.

This beautifying was not confined to face alone. The bath was a daily ceremonial with all ancient peoples, palm and olive oils the cleansers used.

Bathe with Palmolive and keep your skin smooth and white. It is a luxury all can afford.

EDITORIAL CHAT

THE last month of summer usually means a holiday for most of us:—a breathing-space or a resting-place somewhere near the lake or in the woods. What a lucky land this is, with its many camping-grounds, its myriad spots, any one of which would be a paradise for a picnic! There is hardly a town or village in Canada which is entirely remote from a broad sheet of water. A Canadian who has been deservedly successful in England, Mr. Arthur Beverley Baxter, was recently in Toronto on a visit to his old home and, in the course of a few remarks, told a Toronto audience that the St. Lawrence River impressed him anew with its vastness and beauty as the steamer proceeded from the Gulf to Quebec. A visitor from India once called our St. Lawrence a "lordly river" and expressed wonder that Canadians did not worship such a stream. With the proverbial blindness of those who stay at home, we do not recognize the grandeur of our own scenes until we return to them, after an absence in other lands. Now, of course, Canadians cannot claim the credit of the mountains, the forests and the mighty rivers, but they can be deeply thankful, especially in the golden summer days, for the vast playgrounds which have fallen to their lot.

The cover design which our issue displays this month gives us the very spirit of the woodlands in "The Grove of Venus." Mr. Carl Ahrens has long been noted as one of our leading artists:—none more sensitive to the strength and beauty of our forest depths. This reproduction of his painting we are sure will be valued highly by all lovers of art.

For our September issue, Mr. J. E. Laughlin has returned to the subject so popular with readers of the magazines:—the pretty girl. We are showing you on this page a reproduction of our September cover, which gives a foretaste of our first autumn number. Of course, the black-and-white reproduction can give you no idea of the richness of coloring in this study of the September girl, but, even in the half-tone the brightness of treatment is suggested. In October you will have a delightfully fantastic and witch-like cover, which will give you Hallows'even sky, at once, and which is the work of Emily Hand, another Ontario artist. But here we are, looking forward to October, when our immediate interest is with August.

Mr. Collier Stevenson, who was almost severely practical in July and wrote about "Those Utilitarian Rooms", such as the pantry and the bath room, has fallen upon a more casual subject this month and writes a highly interesting article upon "The Little Extra Rooms." Of course, we do not mean to say that the practical rooms which were discussed in our July issue are not of the greatest importance. They are, indeed, essential to every well-regulated household, for we cannot live in comfort without cleanliness and good cookery. The picture of the bathroom in the July article was especially attractive and made us feel that we do not spend half enough money, time and thought on that feature of the house. However, in this issue, Mr. Stevenson regards rooms which are the luxuries rather than the necessities:—the music room, the "den," the breakfast room, the sewing room, etc. These articles are written with a genuine sympathy for the housewife or homemaker who wishes to have everything about her (or his) abode just as beautiful as it can be. We wish that the extremely good photographs which Mr. Stevenson sends us could be reproduced in color, but his descriptions give us a very tempting picture of many a decorative scheme. Wouldn't you like the room with the wonderful Chinese rug, or the little grey reception room which has shades of silver gauze with orange lining?

We know that you are taking an interest in the articles of our culinary department and that you appreciate the discourses on food values which Miss McNally writes in such an interesting fashion. It is difficult, indeed, to keep up with all that we should concerning what we eat. Just as we thought we understood about the calories, along came the vitamins, and we had to begin all over again to find out what we needed most. However, Miss McNally understands your problems and can give the solution: so that, if you follow her instructions, the menu of the household will be properly balanced and you'll be able "to slam the door on the doctor's nose."

Speaking of the health of the family reminds us that the Family Physician has written some excellent articles this summer on the health of the Small Person. You see, if Canada is going to become the kind of Dominion which it certainly ought to be, then the smallest citizens, the babies, must be given every chance. There is another Dominion in the British Empire—New Zealand—which has a marvellous record in the care of the babies—and we do not see why Canada should not overtake New Zealand in the standard for the nursery. So, be sure to read all that the Family Physician has to say, on the subject of baby clinics and the care of the Newest Citizen.

We are sure that you will approve of the way in which our serial, "The Idol of Youth," comes to a conclusion, and we know that you have admired Patchinka and her gallant lover, Captain Malet, to say nothing of the dog, Petro. We are fortunate in having secured the Canadian serial rights for "Pamela Pounce, a tale of Tempestuous Petticoats," which is one of the latest works by Agnes and Egerton Castle. The latter died some years ago, and Agnes Castle died this spring. Their collaboration in many novels proved highly successful and it is interesting to note that James K. Hackett, the Canadian actor, played the part of hero in "The Pride of Jennico," their first popular achievement, which made an attractive play. "The Bath Comedy" and "Sweet Kitty Bellairs" were highly approved by all readers of light romance, and "Pamela Pounce," the serial which begins its course in our September issue is a continuation of these stories of Bath. Kitty Bellairs, now Lady Kilcrouney, enters the scene once more, as charming as when she was a distracting young widow and the belle of Bath. It is a tale of the gayety of long ago.

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPTHA ODOR

THE FIRE FLOWERS

BY JUDITH KINGDON

Illustrated by Maude MacLaren

It was the beginning of August when he first saw her. He had been pulling stumps in his clearing—charred stumps that blackened his hands and, in turn, his face. To the west along the river bank mile upon mile stretched an old brule, the whole a great garden of glorious, pale purple flowers, long spikes of phlox-like blossoms,—the fireweed with which the Earth, after the flaming scourge of the bush has passed by, seeks to cover her black barrenness and desolation.

She was standing among the flowers watching him. Her dress was plain, of print, and in her hand she carried a big "cow-bite" hat. But her hair, oh, the beauty of it,—her hair was crinkly, shining gold. There was a halo around her head in the light of the westerling sun. At first he thought her unreal, the Spirit of the Fire Flowers, or a sister to the clumps of goldenrod scattered here and there among the purple blossoms.

Pulling a huge spotted red handkerchief out of his overall pocket he wiped his dirty face. He took off his battered straw hat. He stood and stared at her with delight. She smiled at him frankly. "I'll help you get that out," she said. She came forward, moving with ease and grace. She swung on the end of his pry with him after he had first adjusted the block under it, and with her added weight the stump quickly turned over. And that was the beginning of it.

Towards the end of September, when the moosemissi was decked in yellow and red, when every little bush and vine vied with its neighbor in vivid colorings, when the birches and the poplars glowed golden against the dark green of the fir trees, Russell Dennison and Hester Morrow were married.

* * *

Russell and Hester were wonderfully happy in the beginning. They were intensely interested in everything about them and in each other. Their clearing and their log house seemed to be a little bit of Paradise dropped down in the bush. It was an endless source of delight to Russell to watch his new wife working about the house. His eyes never tired of following her busy fingers. Sometimes he wondered how he had ever existed before she came to him. And she in her turn adored him.

The long northern winter settled down upon them. At first the snow was soft and wet, the skies were dull. But by the new year the cold grew more intense, the days were brilliant. Russell was chopping bush. Sometimes Hester went out and helped him with the underbrushing for company's sake. In the evening they sat by their big round-barrelled camp stove which they plied with three-foot tamarac logs. Sometimes when there was a moon they would take a short tramp up the river on their snowshoes.

It was the middle of January. Russell came home one afternoon to find Gordon Patton there partaking of afternoon tea and cookies. Patton was a very likeable fellow and delightful to talk with, but of no use to anyone in the world, for when there was any whiskey within reach everything else went by the board. In fact, that was why he was living by himself in the bush, because his people would not have him at home where he was continually disgracing them. So they paid him to stay up there. When he found Hester made him welcome he came often, for a man living all by himself in the bush grows lonely. In his bachelor days Russell had liked him well enough, but now, with Hester there, and Patton being what he was.....

Life in the bush is monotonous in the winter, neighbors far away and friends few. Hester was always glad to see Patton. But Russell, coming in tired from his chopping and finding the man there once or perhaps even twice a week, felt outraged. Finally he expostulated.

"But I like to hear him talk. I like to listen to him. He tells such interesting stories. He's not like anyone else around here. And he's not doing any harm." Hester refused to see any reason why he should not come.

"Do you think I'm going to have him lazing around here, saying pretty things to you while I'm out working hard?"

Russell worked long hours. Now he worked longer. He stayed away in the bush. He grew sullen and suspicious. The little house became silent as their intimate conversations dwindled and the songs died in Hester's heart before they reached her lips. Hester resented his attitude. She liked Patton only for the change and entertainment he afforded her. But she was a bit stubborn. She would not have it that he should not come.

Finally, one day Patton came when he was not quite sober, very talkative and red of face. Hester was disgusted and perhaps a trifle afraid. Russell had seen him coming and returned to the house. Hester felt grateful for his protecting presence.

But Russell was more under the influence of his anger and jealousy than Patton was of drink. He told Hester to leave the room. Hester, being unused to taking such brusque orders from anyone, refused to go. He glared at Patton belligerently.

"Whadda ya wanta send your wife out for, eh? Nice li'l girl. Pretty li'l girl. She—she makes good cake.

man she had known,—the man she had first seen that summer day struggling with the blackened stumps, the man who later had adoringly watched her willing hands performing their homely domestic duties, the man who won her love twice over with a hundred tendernesses. He was very pale. His eyes were wide and staring. His breathing was labored. She did not know this man.

He came across the room and stood in front of her. His hands were clenched tight. He gave her a smile; she thought it a ghastly smile. She hoped to never again see such a smile as this strange man gave her.

"We've been married four months," he said, "and already you're running after a new face and fine manners." His voice was strained, he seemed to speak with an effort. "I hope you're satisfied now you've seen what a little whiskey does for

At first he thought her unreal, the Spirit of the Fireflowers, or a sister to the clumps of Goldenrod.

Let 'er stay, Russ."

Russell's face was white. His mouth was grim. He took a couple of steps forward. Patton objected to being looked at in that way.

"Say, you lookin' for a fight?" he asked thickly.

Russell controlled himself with an obvious effort. He held the door open. "I wouldn't fight with a drunken swine like you! Get out!"

"Aw, say, am'cha bit hard on a fella?" queried Patton, plaintively, his fighting spirit quickly subsiding.

"Get out!" repeated Russell, savagely. "And if I ever find you hangin' round here after my wife again I'll break your damned neck!"

Patton looked at him with a sly leer, then gave a maudlin chuckle.

"Can't do it," he grinned. "Y'ain't big enough!" He went out amiably and made his slightly unsteady way up the river trail, singing and hallooing at the top of his voice.

Russell shut the door and turned to his wife. He was a different man from the your pretty friend.....friend? Say, isn't one man enough for you? What are you anyway, a light-o'-love? To think I ever wasted any love on such as you!.....and me working out my soul-case here for you! What do you know about love, a light thing like you?"

Hester was frightened; every atom of her was quivering. She edged away from him. He didn't love her any more. He thought such terrible things about her.

"Oh, you don't need to run away from me." He laughed harshly. "I wouldn't lay a finger on you. No. I wouldn't touch you with a barge-pole!" He turned from her with a sneer. He went out, banging the door to after him. He went back to the bush where he had been chopping. He sat down on a newly-felled spruce trunk, put his arms on his knees and buried his face.

* * *

HE sat there till the sun was setting, till the cold was penetrating to his very bones. Then he lifted his face which no longer looked grim. "I hate myself like poison," he said, in a whisper. "I know she didn't mean any harm. I'll go home and perhaps she'll forgive me and kiss me and make up with me again."

So Russell went back home. But he arrived to find no Hester. She had gone. Later, he found she had left on the train from the little station down below, but no one knew where she had gone for she bought no ticket at the station.

Left to himself the winter seemed to close in upon him. By night the stars glittered overhead; the great Orion swung from east to west. By night the northern lights marched back and forth across the sky; the moon shone and the snow, every crystal alive, shone back at it. The tree trunks snapped like pistol shots with the cruel frost. The great horned owl, secure in the black shadows, drifted on wide wings through the trees and cried its melancholy music to the lonely bush—not more lonely than this man.

After a long, long time the spring came. The bare, brown patches of earth smelled sweet. The river was swollen with the melting snow.

"Perhaps she'll come back now, along with the birds," thought Russell wistfully. "I must get a garden in for her."

He planted the garden carefully with everything he thought she might like. Around the house he had pansies and sweet williams and by the south wall where he thought the summer frosts would not catch them he put in nasturtium seeds. By the door he planted larkspur roots. He kept the house spick and span in case she might return. Everything he did was for her. All his thoughts were of her. The sudden flicker of a bird's wing made him catch his breath,—it might be Hester's dress fluttering in the wind! When a song-sparrow sang from the roof of the house, day after day, when a white-throat whistled with exquisite sweetness from the big stump by the river bank, he wished that Hester might be there to hear. The first tiny violets growing in the moss he picked for her and put in water. Sometimes he grew desperate with longing and rushed out and threw himself into his work so that he might be too tired to think. He hoped against hope. Yet Hester did not come.

The bud of spring blossomed into summer. July wore away, August came. The fireweed was in bloom again. Acre upon acre, mile upon mile, the old brules were alight with the glory of pale purple flowers. This was the time she had first come to him. He felt that if she did not come soon she would never come at all. He went back to work among the blackened stumps beside the brule.

"Oh God!" his heart cried in an agony of yearning. "Oh God! Give Hester back to me now the fire flowers have come again. For me—I have no fire flowers to grow in me and cover up my black desolation!"

He could not be idle. He fell to work on the old, half-burned stumps. The solid roots he chopped with his axe. He worked arduously. Stump after stump turned over before his fierce energy. Now he was working right in among the flowers. Here was a bad stump. It did not want to come. There must be a root holding underneath. He fell to work with his mattock, his axe, then back to his block and pry.

As he was straining every muscle, a voice with a little break in it spoke to him. "I'll help you get that out—if you'll let me," it said, hesitatingly.

There, standing among the tall flowers, was Hester in a plain print dress and with her hat in her hand. Her hair had caught the light out of the sun in its crinkles, outrivalling the scattered clumps of goldenrod. Her face was wistful. She smiled at him uncertainly.

"Hester—Hester!" he whispered hoarsely.

"I thought perhaps you might have got over being mad at me by now," she said, "and I wanted to come back when the fireweed was blossoming again. I felt I had to come now or I never would have had the courage again."

He was all clay and charcoal dust and sweat. As he crossed the intervening pace, half-unconsciously he pulled out his big red handkerchief and made a rough pass at his face. He held out his arms to her. She saw the look that was in his eyes and she did not mind the clay nor the charcoal dust nor the sweat.

"Hester.....Hester.....you have come back to me.....oh, thank God!.....you've come back to me.....with the fire flowers."

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.

Captain Malet, a young officer returned from the war, is at Bournemouth with his Aunt Sarah when the beauty and distress of a young foreign guest at the hotel win his interest. In the guise of a waiter he makes her acquaintance, persuades an American millionaire, Henry S. Horden, to give him some caviare for the starving girl, and, before the evening is over, saves her from suicide and makes a friend of her dog, Petro. The girl is Patchinka Kapiieha, a sister of the heroic aviator, Sacha Kapiieha, who had lost his life in the war and whose plane is even then being offered as second prize in the lottery at Monte Carlo. Patchinka is taken to Mr. Horden, who had known her brother and who had wished to buy the aviator's secrets of invention. He adopts Patchinka as his niece and suggests that they should all go to Monte Carlo to buy the plane. In the meantime, Captain Malet is sent to buy a wardrobe for Miss Kapiieha (known as Miss P. Smith) and is having difficulty explaining his needs to the saleswoman, "Miss Forty."

The latter (who is Miss Victoria Wellington) helps him effectively and becomes chaperon to Patchinka on the Monte Carlo expedition. They arrive and discover that three members of a syndicate, Mendez, Dupont and Maroni, are planning to secure the plane. Mr. Horden's wife (Dutch by birth) has been living at The Hague, but the daughter, Wendela, arrives at Monte Carlo, unknown to her father. The woman whom Sacha had loved, the Marquesa di Fiumine who is unhappily married, is at Villa Persane near Monte Carlo. Wendela introduces a complication, becoming attached to the reluctant hero.

Patchinka manages to reach the poor Marquesa, who is in the power of Dr. Silvestro, who tries to represent her as insane. She tells of a wonderful "essence" which Sacha had hidden and which might give the secret of the plane. Captain Malet learns to fly, although his instructor, Gauthier, dislikes him as a rival. The lottery comes off. Patchinka had made a present of the ticket, 1717, to Wendela, and, by a wonderful coincidence, this ticket wins the plane. Dupont then insists that Wendela had promised to sell the plane to him.

Wendela promises to "lend" the aeroplane to Captain Malet. The rescue of the Marquesa is deftly and secretly managed:—also the securing of Sacha's "essence." Captain Malet agrees to take Mendez to Algieras, while Dupont decides to go to Hamada in Algeria. Maroni refuses to fly, saying that he has no trust in an amateur. Wendela discovers that Patchinka, whom she had debarred from being a passenger on the "Mascot," Sacha's aeroplane, is to act as pilot.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

All Aboard!

OF course Wendela said that I couldn't have the biplane. Then she said I was a traitor. Then she cried, she cried so hard that for the first time I had a chance to get a word in—no, two words. They were: "Shut up!"

Miss Horden was so surprised that she ceased sobbing.

"Sorry," said I, "but I had to stop you somehow from having hysterics, and not having a Mills bomb—"

"Brute!" she choked.

"Just so," said I, "but even a brute has rights, and can stand on them—or fly with 'em, as the case may be. Now, you must listen."

"I won't, while that girl's here!" she choked.

"The girl!" was, of course, Patchinka, and the scene of our unrehearsed drama was the hangar where my pilot and I were looking over the Mascot after a wonderful little lunch of celebration at the Paris. Present also was Dupont with one of the Syndicate's detectives; also Viale, beaming joyously in his Sunday-best clothes.

"This is the first time Miss Kapiieha has entered the hangar," I said sharply.

"She stayed away, while the work was being done on the biplane which would now be hers if she hadn't been quixotically generous to you. She stayed away out of deference to your feelings, though your—er—prejudice is absurd. Now we both consider that, as we've fulfilled all your conditions, it remains for you to fulfil ours. You've turned over the biplane to my command since she's ready for flight, and as Miss Kapiieha is the only pilot I can obtain or work with, she must fly with me. You objected to her as a passenger, but you didn't object to her in any capacity, and now it's too late. Don't forget that you and I have a written contract. As you're your father's daughter you must abide by it."

Wendela swallowed a sob as large as an egg. Then, with a flash of rage at Patchinka and a tear of reproach at me she gurgled "Very well, if Miss Kapiieha flies with you as pilot of my aeroplane, I'll fly with you as a passenger in it. It's part of your horrid old written contract that I can be a passenger if I like. And I do like. So there!"

I was struck dumb. What she said was true; and the agreement was in black and white. Since Maroni had backed out, and so curious a destination as Hamada had been proposed, I had been planning to take young Viale or some other fairly trustworthy bruiser in the free seat in order not to have two men against one, if Dupont and Mendez tried any devilry in the desert. Still, there it was! I couldn't dispute Wendela Horden's right to fly as a passenger in her own aeroplane. Things being as they were I would have to abandon the trip or yield to her wishes.

Thinking of Patchinka's danger, I was ready for a moment to throw everything up—money or no money; but the light in the girl's eyes as they met mine promised a man's courage and resource, rather than a woman's, and thrilled me to the heart. In a way, I reflected, Wendela's presence would be a protection. What happened to us would happen to her; or, if not, she would be a dangerous witness against doers of evil deeds. She could neither be destroyed nor even suppressed with impunity, it would seem. Miss Wendela Horden was the daughter of a famous millionaire; and the murder of a millionaire's daughter would make a very bad mess in the newspapers, if not in the desert.

I had no intention of letting anyone be murdered on this expedition, and was already hatching one or two little private counter-plots of my own, in case of trouble with the Syndicate—who must be landed at their destination if possible now that I'd elected to accept their money. Any extra protection thrown in, however, would be welcome, and maybe little Miss Horden of Buffalo, U.S.A., wouldn't after all be such a bad substitute for a Monegasque athlete!

"Righto!" I pronounced at last. "I'm sure we'll all be delighted to have you as a passenger if you think it will amuse you to fly to Africa and Spain and back this windy weather. You haven't any business there so far as I know, and you hate cold like poison; but Miss Kapiieha and I will try to give you a 'joy ride' if you want one."

Wendela replied frigidly, that she was very much obliged.

* * *

I'd been right in believing that no fuss was to be made about the Marquesa di Fiumine's escape from the Villa Persane. Once she was out of the house, she was too sane and could tell too much to be tackled safely by Dr. Silvestro or his employer. She was also too influential and too beloved in the neighbourhood, for force to be attempted. Though the doll must have given Patchinka and me completely away if Silvestro had seen it in the Casino, or compared notes with Maroni, I neither heard from the Doctor nor was visited by him. The game he and the Marquesa had been trying to play was "up" that was all; and if Laurette would let them alone it was evident that they would not try to molest her.

To add to Silvestro's discomfiture at losing his patient and his job, there was the affair of the Persian water-garden. He had been made a fool of, and had destroyed the Marquesa's property without gain to himself. What must have been his point of view was the situation: but the disappointment of the garden was a heavier blow for the Syndicate than for him. They must have guessed by this time that where they had failed, I had succeeded. As proof of that, the Mascot's petrol tank was being filled, and the tins stored in the racks prepared for them, though days ago the French Government had commandeered all the essence-known to them to exist in the South of France.

I would have given something to see Maroni's face, but he had taken it away to parts unknown, and I was too busy to wonder much over the man's disappearance. Mendez had an un-Latin control of his own countenance, and Dupont, (her "flirt") whatever he might fear, was bound to conceal it under assumed delight at having Miss Horden for a fellow passenger.

I'd been studying maps; and I calculated that, as the town of Algiers itself is distant from Monaco roughly about four hundred and twenty-five miles, the flight there and on beyond to Hamada ought not to take much over four hours. Departing in the morning, even with a hitch or two we should reach the end of our first day's journey well before dark. Dupont had explained that the neighbourhood of Hamada was perfect for landing, and for "taking off" when a new start should be made. The desert surrounding the oasis town was practically flat for miles, he said, with a few low sand-dunes here and there. A "borj" or desert inn on the outskirts of the village would give us decent accommodation for the night, and as the place was kept by a Frenchman with two sons, if I wanted help about getting away next day I could have it.

All this sounded ideal, and would have been so in ordinary circumstances with ordinary passengers. But Patchinka and I were convinced that the whole purpose of the flight was to take us at a disadvantage at a spot where Mendez and Dupont could probe the secret of the aeroplane. They had intrigued to find it without leaving Monte Carlo. The didn't want to fly, and they'd tried their best to stop me from flying. But now they were forced to go, or lose the game as di Fiumine and Silvestro had lost theirs. They were dangerous as animals caught in a trap. But they took me for a fool, which without too much conceit counted as a slight mistake. The thought me idiot enough not to suspect their intentions, a sort of male Red Riding Hood, in fact: otherwise they could hardly conceive my risking Patchinka and myself in their hands. This error counted as a point in the game for me and I meant to make the most of it, in my own way.

Part of that way was to be rather more friendly in my manner to Dupont and Mendez than before the flight had been made possible by our luck at the cache. I let them help me stow away the tins of petrol in the side rack under the seats (seventy gallons, enough to get us to Spain, where we could buy plenty) and I didn't discourage Wendela from spending as much time in the hangar during Sunday, as she liked. I was nicer to her than usual. I praised the utterly unsuitable costume of ermine cloak and wrap which she intended to wear for the trip. But it was not till we were ready to start at ten o'clock on Monday morning that I shot my first arrow into the air.

There we stood grouped round the Mascot, the six of us, not counting two mechanics I'd got hold of to send us off. Wendela looking just right for a cold day's shopping in Bond Street or Fifth Avenue; Dupont and Mendez in odorous goat-skins, the only proper part of their get-up being on their heads. Patchinka looking like a slim, adorable boy in her leathers: I looking it doesn't matter how; Petro looking like nothing on earth, in a home-made fur coat and immense goggles twice the ordinary size. Patchinka and I—pilot and observer—in front, with Petro squashed between us on the floor; Dupont and Wendela at liberty to flirt if they chose in the adjacent front seats of the cabin just behind us; Mendez equally at liberty to spy and eavesdrop in the chair behind. Suddenly before helping Wendela to mount, I stopped proceedings, and said: "Oh, by the by, I wired your father in Paris, Miss Horden."

"You wired my father!" she echoed. "Why—why—why you don't know him—personally. —do you? You never said you did."

"It wasn't necessary to mention it," I replied. "I've met Mr. Horden in a business way—business about the aeroplane and—er—caviare. I didn't feel like taking this responsibility over his daughter without telling him what's up, and the destination we're bound for, especially as one of them is in an out-of-the-way part of the world. That it's out of the way for ordinary folk like us, but not for a man like your father."

He's known everywhere—even at Hamada, I expect; and there seems to be telegraphic communications all over Algeria, even in the wildest oasis towns."

"Well, you needn't have done that, Mr. Smart Aleck!" snapped Miss Horden. "I'm of age!"

"Oh," said I, "I thought you told me one night at the Casino you were only nineteen?"

"Eighteen is of age in America for girls—at least, in some States," Wendela hastily explained. "But anyhow, it doesn't matter. Dad can't stop me now. It's too late for him to wire here. And the next thing we know, we shall be at Hamada."

"I hope so," said I.

Then we all bundled into our places, Patchinka and I just behind the engine; and there was only time for her (whom I'd not seen alone since Sunday noon) to whisper, "I've something to tell you when I get a chance, Duguesclin; something important, but not good—about Laurette and about the secret," before her voice died in the noise of our start.

The Mascot's nose pointed into the wind, which blew strongly from the south-east. The engine was "run up" for a test, making a hideous row: we took off (which the Mascot could do in 20 yards), circled round to obtain necessary height, about four to five thousand feet, then headed south-southwest for Algeria.

CHAPTER XXXIX

WHAT PETRO KNEW

I WAS so wildly happy with Patchinka by my side—my Lady of the Air!—that for a while I forgot all our doubts and difficulties.

How I laughed at my old self, picturing that first day at Nice when I wrestled with the cold-boiled-potato in my chest, and decided that it was all bunkum about any man or woman liking to fly.

Only a few weeks of practice had passed since then, yet now—with a perfect pilot such as Sacha Kapiéha's sister—I felt as gloriously at home in the air as a bird. It would be divine, I thought, to start thus for a honeymoon alone with her. "Contact!" I would say, and kiss her, as we set out for heaven.

I recalled the look in her eyes on a certain night, standing on the Casino steps (wasn't I always recalling it?) and then came the pang which was never absent from that memory: my word, pledged to Wendela. To get for Patchinka what she wanted most I'd had to give up what I'd wanted most—the right to ask the girl I loved if she would be my wife. But that pang wasn't quite so sharp in the sky, as on earth. In these high spaces we belonged to one another. It was only down there on that far off flat thing, that anyone had power to part us.

Besides, here we were side by side, playing this wonderful game together, and the obnoxious female Fate who wished to separate us was enclosed in a stuffy little cabin behind our backs with two detestable men. The three had a strangle hold over us down below, perhaps, but up here we could juggle with them as we liked: make them seasick and scare them blue with "stunts".

I chuckled to myself at this thought: but if I did any "stunts" it mustn't be now. The time for them would be later.

While we two, seated just behind the engine and in front of the cabin, could see a hundred miles in any direction, those in the wooden enclosure couldn't see at all except out of Viale's well-made small-paned windows.

We saw the Mediterranean like an illimitable floor of turquoise, touched with dazzling gold by the morning sun. Baby clouds floated past like lace handkerchiefs the angels had lost. The wind in our faces was cold, but its tingled breath was sweeter than can be imagined by earth-dwellers who've never flown. The mere touch of it was like the magic gift of life. I was a body of flesh and blood no longer. I was an astral body on an astral plane, flying beside Patchinka's astral body. And I'm afraid my joy was half unconsciously increased by my knowledge of what the cabined one must feel.

Their sole advantage over us was they didn't need to pull their goggles in front of their eyes. But they would be almost stuffy in there. They would long to know just what was being done with them by the pilot and observer-mechanic. They'd be afraid that in some way they were being deceived as to direction—yes, even if they held their compasses in their hands. They would fear some awful accident of which they would have no inkling till too late to save themselves from dying like rats in a trap: and worse than all, each would have that bug-bear sensation of passengers who must sit idle thinking of themselves that he (and she!) had some vague peculiar responsibility for the balance of the machine.

In Patchinka's ears and mine the drone of the engine had become sweet, but I was sure I was giving Mendez and Dupont a headache, even though Wendela was immune.

Into a cloud we plunged. Patchinka and I loved it as we would have loved a pillow fight, because she had taught me to love the Air in all its moods. But—ha, ha!—I guessed les autres in there weren't loving it! They must feel as if they were being smothered.

As for Petro, though he crouched warmly, closely against our legs, I knew he wasn't shrinking. He was hugging something was wrong with the mechanism of his beloved 'plane, but that something was about to go wrong!

Of course this was nonsense—must be; just the credulity of an adorable girl who believed her dog a super-dog. Why, some of the stories Sacha had told her of Petro must have been fairy tales, I thought such as his anguish and refusal to eat if Kapiéha made a flight without him; his attempt to hang on by his teeth to the tail-skid rather than be left behind; his haughty lack of interest in other machines, not his master's. Nevertheless, nonsense or no nonsense, Petro's new restlessness was a little odd, and a quick nod of Patchinka's head, indicating the dog, suggested that the same thought was in her mind.

The strong wind had drifted us slightly out of our course, which headed straight for Algiers; and the Island of Corsica (often I'd admired it from Monte or Cap Martin as a glittering mirage) now shaped in material form on the sea.

Just at this moment, when Petro was proposition; but it had to be worked out in a hurry; and though neither Patchinka nor I concerned ourselves with them, we knew that frightened faces must be pressed against the window close behind our backs.

We were down so low that we could see groups of buildings. There was one largish town by the sea—Ajaccio, we judged by what we knew of Corsica through study of our map. A strip of shore there was near by, which looked to be sandy and fairly smooth. With some machines one would have known this strip too small to give hope of safety in landing, yet with the Mascot it might be chanced. And things were getting ticklish. There was nothing else to do but try.

CHAPTER XL

A Bit of Fluffy Wco!

THE world rose up to meet us, not with a smile of welcome but with a threatening frown.

The strip of earth which was our one himself against us to tell us silently of his joy, the air was his element as it was Patchinka's.

The strip of earth which was our one hope of landing without a crash showed rocks fierce as a black bull . . . ready to toss us on his horns.

Many animals, they say, can't comfortably go beyond an altitude of five thousand feet—about the height of which we were flying now. But Patchinka had told me that, with Sacha Petro had achieved the record of altitude for any dog or other animal, unless a mascot eagle. He had been up with his master thirteen thousand feet and hadn't turned a hair. Also there were few stunts he hadn't shared, from looping the loop, to the "falling leaf".

Some dogs, Patchinka had scornfully said, "hadn't the imagination" to look over the side of the machine; but Petro stolid British bull-dog as he was (and is) on the surface, has the heart of a sportsman and an explorer. He gazed down at the sea through his goggles; he snapped at clouds; he stared fascinated at the propeller, a mere whirling haze in its speed; he looked up prayerfully at the zenith, seeming to thank heaven that he was in his master's dear old 'plane again. And who could tell, perhaps he saw what we couldn't see—his master's spirit? Oh, this Petro was not a bad sea dog. He was a glad air dog, if ever there was one!

We had been flying to perfection for some time—despite the wind, which would blow us a little out of our course—when suddenly Petro's evident joy decreased. He became uneasy. I wondered why. We had dropped a little on account of the clouds. Perhaps he found the going a bit bumpy. But I remembered Patchinka's theory that the dog had a queer "sixth sense" which told him, not that fussing, and Patchinka glancing at me, the engine began to misfire, and the "revs" dropped.

Could it really be that the dog had known before we knew? Was Sacha's spirit with us on this flight, and had he prompted Petro to give this warning which Patchinka, at least, was likely to understand?

We shall never fathom that mystery while we live, and can believe the dog's nervousness a mere coincidence if we choose. What we did know was that something odd and unexpected had happened, and that it was a jolly good thing to have Corsica spread out like a convenient rug to land on.

Not that the formation of Corsica in the very least resembled a rug, worse luck! As we approached, and dropped, we could plainly see (what we know already from maps) that the island bristled with mountains. In fact, it consisted of mountains, with here and there a narrow belt of beach or level land. Still, any land is better than no land when you're flying over the sea, and get engine trouble.

It seemed, I thought, too bad to be true that we should have this trouble or any other! The machine had been in perfect condition, and nothing had been taken out of her since our start about an hour ago. We ought to be all right, unless we had a Jonah on board. But we weren't right, and—there it was!

Suddenly, the engine cut out altogether, and as the Mascot glided down, down softly yet swiftly, towards that bright lump of mountains in the sea, our eyes sought anxiously for a possible landing.

It seemed at first sight a difficult hope of landing without a crash showed rocks fierce as a black bull roused at sight of us, ready to toss us on his horns. But my Lady from the Air was Sacha Kapiéha's sister. Because she loved his machine she could coax it as no one else could, except Sacha himself. It was beautiful to see (and feel) her pan-caking down with the most exquisite skill, avoiding the rocks and rough ground, to alight with scarce a jar on the one bit of decent sand within reach.

I heard myself shout "Hurrah!" leaping out almost as we touched. After a stagger I steadied myself and went to examine the under-carriage which, slight as the shock had been, I was afraid might be damaged. If it were, the outlook for a quick restart would not be brilliant. I could find nothing wrong, however, nor could Patchinka, who wasn't six seconds behind me in springing onto terra firma. I blessed the riggers of the machine, and Sacha the designer.

"We don't seem to have come a cropper landing," said I. "But what knocked us out like that, to begin with? We were going too sweetly! Have you the faintest notion of the cause?"

"Just that—the faintest notion," she echoed, in an odd, excited tone. "There's a thing which might—but oh, here they come! I can't tell you anything now. They'll want to know what the trouble is. We must say it may be serious."

I gasped slightly, yet asked no questions. For one thing there wasn't time. For another, I wouldn't have done so if there had been. I trusted the girl completely.

Our passengers had come trembling out of the cabin, and even Dupont had forgotten that one should always, in every circumstance, be charming to a millionaire's daughter. The two men pushed past the crumpled Wendela as if she'd been a sack of potatoes that had got in their way. Dupont's face was like dough, and Mendez was gray-green as the olives of his own Spain. The pair had doubtless been in a frightful funk about the safety of their skins, but now the old obsession of greed had conquered physical fear.

One backward glance when they'd scrambled down to earth showed me the thought behind their anxious eyes.

The men believed now that we'd tricked them; that we had landed not because of a genuine accident, but for some dark purpose of our own. They were wild lest we should do in a minute, almost under their noses, what we'd been trying to do in the hangar each day and night of the last week at Monte Carlo. That was why they forgot the importance of Miss Horden, thinking only of themselves—and the presumed secret of the aeroplane.

"What's the matter?" panted Mendez. "Don't know yet," I grumbled. "The principal thing is, we all seem to be alive and unsmashed."

Patchinka was peering at the undercarriage, already closely examined by me. "I'm afraid this will—er—hang us up for a while," she announced, her accent delicious as always, when she drops into slang. "There is something" (she made it "somesing") "very funny here."

The two men were at her back as she spoke, and instantly I knew that this was what she wished. She wanted the pair to be glued to her. She wanted to leave me free. But Miss Horden had clumsily reached earth at last, with much display of silk stockings. She wouldn't go to see what Patchinka was up to. No such luck as that! I murmured a word in Polish (learned from Miss Kapieha) and Petro placed himself stolidly between me and the figure in ermine.

"O-oh!" squeaked Wendela. "That awful monster! He's growling at me. Call him off, Boy, call him off!"

"He doesn't like all that white fur of yours," I suggested. "Better keep a bit in the background. I haven't time to deal with Petro now."

The young lady retreated a few steps, and I asked myself what definite thing it was that Patchinka had freed me to do. That it was definite, I felt sure. But—why, it must be the obvious thing, of course!

We'd been having engine trouble of some sort, and though the carburettor had been right as rain when we started the symptoms suggested that thereabouts lurked the mischief. Patchinka must know this as well as I did. She was keeping the two men off while I looked over the petrol system; that, I told myself eagerly, was her object.

The pair suspected us both, but probably they'd argued it out between them that, if indeed one of us knew the Secret, that one was doubtless the designer's sister. And now she lured them to go on thinking so, the young siren! What a great little actress she was! Her air was so stealthy, her small hands so tremulous that any gallery god would have spotted her for the villain of the piece.

Answering silly questions from Wendela, at her Petrobound distance, I worked inconspicuously. Chatting as if what I did was of small significance, I unscrewed the union of the petrol pipe, under the tank, and found as I expected that it was tightly blocked. Scarcely a drop had been reaching the pressure-fed carburettor. But what was the obstruction blocking the pipe, and how could it have got into the petrol, 30 crystal-clear gallons of which I myself had poured into the tank before our start?

The object felt like a small stone—very smooth—very round—or more like a boy's marble than a stone, perhaps. I fished to get it out, but it was closely wedged. Then I remembered a knife Aunt Sarah had given me when I was fifteen: one of those knives you think at that age, you'll use a dozen times a day all your life, whereas you use it once in a blue moon, if ever. You know the sort, bristling with blades and corkscrews and gimlets and even metal tooth-picks! It had gone with me through the war, and was still virgin. It had become a fetish. I'd always thought I might want it, and certainly would if I ever left it behind. This morning I'd almost given the thing to my waiter at the British Hotel, in far off Monte Carlo. But not quite. It was in my pocket now. And a wirelike glove-buttoner did the trick.

When I'd forced the obstruction out and hastily screwed up the pipe to stop the sudden flow of petrol which gushed forth, I got the shock of my young life. If I had been a woman, but not a "real lady," I should have bellowed. If I'd been a lady, but not a real woman, I should have squeaked. For the thing I'd picked out of the petrol pipe was a great, creamy pearl.

"What's that you're staring at in your hand?" bawled Wendela, across Petro. "Er—something that stopped up the petrol pipe," I evaded her—and itched to choke the girl instead.

"Ah, but what? I asked you what?" Confound the female, she'd not have been Wendela Horden if she hadn't persisted. And I knew she'd go on persisting till I satisfied her fully.

The sharpness of her tone caught Dupont's attention. He turned from Patchinka's tinkering to mine. But I secret receptacle. Each would be a new danger. They must be sought for and somehow got out. As for the secret receptacle itself, extricating that would be far more difficult, unless there were a manhole in the bottom of the tank. But there must be a manhole! Sacha would have arranged that, and anyhow, I should soon see. At present, however, we need worry only about loose pearls, which by draining the tank I could seek without my real object being detected. The receptacle (I pictured it as a metal cylinder) I couldn't take out through a manhole without fear of being caught by Dupont and Mendez. Though they could know nothing of the pearls, they did know about the papers. They knew also that our whole purpose was to obtain them, just as it was theirs. The sight of anything larger than—let's say, a pearl, emerging from the fastnesses of the plane would be a signal to attack.

Thinking this over quickly, I decided that the "scrap" I looked forward to had perhaps better come in the Algerian

"I hear," I said, "and to hear would be to obey, only when flying though man may propose, in the end the aeroplane disposes. But—Ajaccio's close by. You must have seen the big Naval Port as we came down, with all the torpedo boats looking like rows of black water bottles fast asleep? Well, you can get a ship of sorts at Ajaccio, and—"

"A ship!" mocked Mendez, who had torn himself from Patchinka and joined Dupont. "A ship is not quick enough for us. It would not take us where we want to go. To me, there seems nothing much wrong with this machine. But there will doubtless be expert airmen in Ajaccio who can tell us the truth if you can't. At all costs, we must start or again and reach Hamada before night."

"You are most unselfish, Senor Mendez," I said. "One sees it is for your friend's sake you speak, since Hamada is nothing to you, I understand."

"It is something to me," he contended. "It is a stage of my journey. The sooner I am there the sooner I shall get on further."

"I see," I said. But I didn't see, quite, and privately I wished I could. What I did see was how right and easy everything would be if only this aeroplane hadn't been won by Wendela.

The blighters shan't get to Hamada before night, anyhow, I resolved, since that's what they've set their hearts on—at all costs. Those costs are meant to fall on us, I'd bet every dashed tin of petrol we've got on board!

Nevertheless, I realized that we should not gain much from remaining indefinitely in our present position. The whole town had beheld us descending, and now the whole town was turning out to see for itself why we had descended. There were women and children as well as men and some of the men had the look of being gendarmes. On the blue bay of Ajaccio little boats moved swiftly in our direction. One would have thought we were a wrecked liner, packed with millionaires ready to offer bribes beyond the dreams of avarice!

CHAPTER XLI.

The Blessing of the Crowd.

JUST one blessing the crowd did bring. After we'd explained what our knowledge of Italian ran to, with additions in French, (splashing ahead of Mendez and Dupont) we snatched a few words together.

"'Twasn't fluffy wool in the petrol pipe 'Twas a pearl," I whispered to Patchinka.

"Ah, I knew Sacha meant to hide his papers in a cylinder of metal at the bottom of the tank!" she breathed. "I vowed to him I'd never tell the secret. But every thing's changed now, and I can speak. He must have put the pearls in with the papers. I always hoped he had, and—told you before we started this morning there was bad news from Laurette about the duplicate plans. She did have them to keep for Sacha, though never the pearls. The papers—very thin and small—were in a letter of Sacha's to her—letter in a secret drawer of her desk. All his letters were in the same place. He husband guessed there was such a drawer. When he came back from Austria he broke the desk to find it. Laurette seized the letters from his hand and rather than he should read them, she burnt the whole packet before his eyes. So, if there are no duplicate plans hidden in this machine the papers are lost to me forever, and our fight has failed. It's glorious about the pearl, though! That looks as if the cylinder has been safe all these years, thank the Saints! But it must have shaken loose—it must have opened and if the string of the pearls has broken there may be lots of them rolling about in the tank."

"Maybe," I agreed. "In that case, we restart, history'll repeat itself and the engine will go 'dud' again when there's no right little tight little island to land on."

"I thought of this," murmured Patchinka, "when I said I had lost the faintest notion what our engine trouble might be. Only it seemed too good to be true. It's why I wanted to rest long enough where we are, for a thorough search if possible. But will it be possible with all these people about? They're capable of stopping as long as we do."

"They are capable of it," I prophesied. "I'm afraid there's no hope of that alleg-

The Amber Lake

By F. O. Call.

*The sun has gone down and the shadows
Creep across the northern hills, and lay
Purple carpets at the feet of the fir-trees
All along the silver margin of the bay.*

*Sleeping underneath the silent water,
Pillowed on a pearl and amber sky,
Magic hills aglow with sunset fire,
Shadowy woods and haunted valleys lie.*

*Come soon, O night, with veils of darkness,
Make the amber lake a blue abyss,
For I can bear the magic of the moonlight,
But I fear unearthly beauty such as this.*

was just a little too quick for him. Pretending not to notice his move, I replied to Wendela.

"Bit of fluffy wool," I explained, producing a ball of the said stuff, which I'd taken from the pocket of my leather coat to wrap round a torn finger-nail. The wool was realistically wet with petrol as well as blood; and inside it was—the pearl.

"Funny how it got into the tank," I went on innocently, "but queer things do happen when you fly! I must keep this as a souvenir. Chaps would never believe me if I told such a tale and couldn't prove it."

"Well, if you've found the source of the trouble," remarked Dupont in French. "It will be unnecessary for Miss Kapieha to continue searching, and we might try to restart. My friend and I—particularly I—wish to arrive at the end of this journey without more delay. We supposed that the young lady was an expert, even if—"

"If she weren't an expert, we'd have crashed on the rocks, and perhaps the petrol tank would have exploded, and by this time we'd all have been in Kingdom Come, after being burnt to cinders," I harrowed the cad, as a Roland for his Oliver. The pearl in its protective wool was now safe in my pocket, but if there'd been one in the tank there might be more, which had escaped from some desert than here in Corsica. For an excitable crowd of natives was thronging to the scene of action at this moment. Corsicans are more Italian than French in language and ways, although French citizens by law. Mendez and Dupont could both speak Italian. I could not. And they were far more fluent than Patchinka, though she had some knowledge of Italian as of all other languages which I'd yet come across. The men might cook up some story, and have us clapped into prison in Ajaccio, if we gave them the slightest shadow of excuse. Besides, certain preparations I had made were more suited to the desert than our present situation.

"If Miss Kapieha had been an amateur—as your friend Maroni called her and me," I went on, "if she hadn't been used to all kinds of stunts, she'd have ruined the machine, even if she hadn't killed us, landing in such small space. She'd probably have glided down, instead of putting the plane into a steep side-slip till nearly the last, then flattening out and dropping onto this hearth-rug of sand with barely a few yards run. Even if we don't get off again till tomorrow, you ought to be thanking her on your knees instead of grumbling."

"Don't get off till tomorrow!" Dupont flung the words back in my face. "But we must get off. Do you hear, sir, we must!"

Dupont's face was like dough and Mendez was grey-green as the olives of his own Spain.

cylinder is knocking around inside the tank, of our rescuing it unnoticed. But after all, it's yours by every right, and—

"Miss Horden wouldn't think so. She hates me worse than ever because I came as pilot. She says it was a 'mean trick.' Perhaps even the law would give Wendela all the contents of the Mascot, as it's her property. And then Dupont would somehow make her marry him, so the plans for the new inventions would be his."

"Heavens! What a beastly idea!" I almost laughed at its grim grotesqueness.

"Not too beastly for him. Do you think anything—that he can get a chance to do—is too beastly for those wretches?"

"No, I'm afraid I don't," I felt bound to admit. "But the pearls—why, they're Miss Horden's anyhow, I suppose. At least they're her father's, if Kapiha got money to build his Mascot on the promise of them. Rather complicated, this business, as it's turning out. What?"

"It won't be complicated if those men get their way," shrugged Patchinka. "It will be quite simple. It won't matter to whom the things belonged at first. In the end they mean that all shall belong to them. That's why we're to land at Hamada, of course; you and I have guessed that from the first."

"We have. And we've prepared to act accordingly. Still, landing here in civilization would be providential if only we could make proper use of our accident."

"Ah, if!" she echoed. "It was what I hoped for when we came down here. But I hadn't counted on this crowd. As it is, do your best, my Duquesclin. But it's in my bones that we shall leave here—defeated."

"Not utterly," I cheered her. "At worst we may collect a few more pearls. And we're no longer uncertain. We know there's the whole lot for us to find later."

"For us—or for others?"

"You're not losing courage? Not you!" Her eyes flashed green. "A Kapiha doesn't lose courage. But—"

"What is the 'but'?"

"I wasn't to hear, however, unless Wendela heard, too, for Petro, excited by the crowd, in an absent-minded moment had let her slip by his barrage."

With an eye on the dog she sidled up to us. "You're talking secrets!" she accused me: "secrets about my machine. I can tell by your faces. I believe Dupont's right about you, after all, Boy, though I defended you to him. He says he and his two friends know you and Miss Kapiha are plotting to get hold of something valuable which is hidden in this aeroplane. That would be plotting against me. Because the plane's mine, you know perfectly well, and everything in it's mine, too."

"I think you might trust me to not defraud you," I said. "As for Miss Kapiha—"

"Nothing you can say will make me trust her," cut in Wendela, her voice like an ice axe. "That's why I came to-day. But I'd like to trust you. I should feel real sick if it turned out I couldn't. But here's just one thing I want to remind you of here and now, Boy. Remember your solemn promise to me. Remember why and how I lent you this aeroplane."

"I remember distinctly," I replied.

"You've kept your word—honest Injun?"

"I have."

"And you will keep it?"

"You can depend upon that, Miss Horden."

Apropos of "remembering," just then Petro remembered his charge. He tore back like a condensed whirlwind and blew through his nostrils at Wendela's ermine coat.

She jumped back with a screech; and retired into the background, or at least into the middle distance, where she was joined by Dupont. Something in the expression of his face made me wonder if Patchinka's suggestion was so absurd after all. He was trying to make up for his late rudeness in taking Wendela for a potato sack. He was all eyes—all graces. She simpered under her light lashes in my direction. If I'd been the conceited ass she tried to make of me, I'd have thought her aim was to rouse my jealousy! By and by she stopped simpering and seemed to grow excited. She looked as if she thought herself a figure of romance.

"If Dupont isn't proposing, he's working up to it," murmured Patchinka, her air sophisticated as that of Lilith the Serpent. "He's counting us out, you and me, Duquesclin,—after Hamada."

"That's where he gets left," said I. "Hang Hamada!"

Patchinka shrugged slim shoulders, looking more grave than on that night when she had but one dress and her last dinner. Smiles would come, however, for the Corsicans were playing a pretty comedy for our benefit. The scene was set as if for light opera. We, and the Mascot, were the leading characters, and the dark, proud-faced natives of the neighborhood were the chorus. But did you ever see a chorus bent on selling cheese and chestnuts, especially cheese, to the hero and heroine? I never did, till we landed near Ajaccio.

It was wonderful cheese they had brought; white and solid looking, pressed into half-round baskets which marked it queerly; and handsome women explained that it was the national dish, druccio, very famous and better to eat than anything else on earth. To ingratiate ourselves we bought some, also roasted chestnuts almost as large as eggs. Patchinka drank goat's milk and liked it, and Wendela wished to purchase a rare baby moulon as a rival to Petro, but abandoned the idea when the creature butted her.

Thanks to varied excitements, I snatched a second now and then, unobserved by Dupont or Mendez. Having already drained the tank by disconnecting the tap, I'd paved the way for lightning investigations. The first detail of importance I hit upon was the hoped-for manhole in the bottom of the tank. This, had I ever got an unwatched opportunity, I should have found during work in the hangar; but even so, under the mass of syndicate or Wendela I could have done nothing. Now, the excuse of tinkering at the machine did give me a chance and I made the most of it. I even touched the secret container inside the tank, that had been attached to the plug, supposed to be used for draining petrol. It had been reinforced as well as hidden by a support, but had worked loose, though to my disappointment had not entirely parted from its moorings. Had it been completely freed, I might have drawn it out through the manhole, beneath which Sacha had arranged a clear space of more than twelve inches. The fastening held, however, and all I dared do was to stuff up the broken end with a small wad of my fluffy wool. The cylinder, which I could only feel—not see—was about two inches in diameter, and my guess was that Sacha had divided the interior—an outer part to contain the pearls, an inner space to hold thin and closely rolled papers. I fished two more pearls, and two only, from the smooth depths of the drained tank, and hid them as I had hidden the first, in a bit of soaked wool. After that I could but trust that all might go well—till Hamada.

That was what I said to myself; "till Hamada." After Hamada—but it seemed useless to make little snug plans for anything after that. What I had done, with Patchinka's help, was first to prepare for Hamada. Beyond, my mind refused to go.

Mendez and Dupont wished to reach Hamada before dark, consequently I determined that the veil of night should fall over the desert before we reached there.

By dint of tinkering, seeing to nuts, bracing wires and interplane struts, Patchinka and I contrived to delay our start till towards sunset. When at last I'd refilled the tank with the carefully saved petrol which had been drained out, the sky was aflame and red-purple as if spilled wine had run into the blues of the sea.

Just before we rose a land breeze brought to our nostrils the balsam scent of far-off maquis, aromatic bushes, wild rose and myrtle which is the famed perfume of Corsica, and Patchinka and I looked into each other's eyes, as yet ungoggled.

"What beauty, what sweetness!" she sighed, with a new wistfulness. "I drink it. Do you remember my 'Ave Cæsar'?"

"I do," I answered. "It was the key to the puzzle of you. Do you feel—er—that way now?"

"I don't want you or me to die. I don't mean for us to die," the girl said. "But we know there's something hanging over us. It comes into my mind—I can't help it—that this wonderful sunset may be the last we will ever see."

"Anyhow, it's a jolly good one," I said cheerfully, "but I expect to see lots of others just as fine. Don't forget, we're giving the Syndicate plans a jolt by starting late. Whatever the show is that they've ordered in our honour, it was due to open early. And it won't."

Patchinka smiled. "If you think I'm afraid you make a mistake. I'm not. I'm only thoughtful. That's all."

And we had time for no more. Already Wendela wanted to know what we were "mumbling about." She wanted me to help her get to the cabin. She wanted an assurance that this time everything would be all right. I gave it; but there was much more confidence in my air than in my heart. We had a long flight over water before us. And if more pearls worked out through that wad of fluffy wool—well, Patchinka's "Ave Cæsar" would be an appropriate as well as a polite salutation from "those about to die."

CHAPTER XLII

The Desert Welcome.

THERE ought to have been no fun in the thought of a night flight across water, with a two-to-one chance of "pearl trouble" any moment. But somehow there was fun in it, even with Patchinka at her most temperamental, and in the throes of a presentiment I had heard her say she had "night eyes," and I trusted them; my own, too. Besides, any known danger was better to face than the vague menace of keeping the Syndicate's schedule, and their impotent rage at our delay did me good. They weren't quite sure whether we had had an accident or a fake; and they suspected every word, every move. But we knew how to manage the machine and they didn't; so for the time we had them at our mercy, as they hoped later to have us at theirs.

Both men refused to help our start by holding the Mascot's wings while a Corsican Brother held the tail. They feared we would fly away and leave them in the lurch, a trick I should have loved to play if I hadn't accepted their money and bound myself to see the adventure through.

Nothing would persuade the couple that we meant to play fair if they played fair with us, so I had to think of a compromise. While Patchinka started the engine I took the tail, with a Corsican (paid in advance) clinging to each wing. It was toss-up whether the amateurs might let go, scared by the noise, but they hung on and we taxied along the short strip of sand. The anxious moment passed. The engine went like a dream, and as I scrambled on board, the Mascot performed her great speciality. Her speed on the ground increased. Avoiding the rocks, her tail lifted, and while a common machine would still have been earthbound, she took her flying attitude.

Corsican cheers followed us skyward, Petro answering. Then we lost all sounds save our own. Our compass-steered course set to suit the wind, we gradually ascended, headed for Algiers. The sea sank down, down, like water running through a sieve, as we rose. The wind-red waves were smoothed to a shining floor of tinted glass. We soon lost the shape of the long island with its

THE proprietor of the boat-house waddled towards us. His pink and puffy cheeks bunched up into a smile of welcome—rolled up under his eyebrows over the two slits which did duty for eyes. In a voice that was faint and high-keyed he inquired:

"What c'n I do fer you, Ladies?"

We told him we should like to look at his power boats.

"We have a canoe," I explained; "but we haven't a motor boat."

"I see," he nodded shortly. "Y've got a camp an' y'ain't got a motor boat!"

His expression was one of infinite pity; his voice sounded like the refrain of "Rescue the Perishing." He turned briskly to his motor boats.

"My stock is a little low," he went on apologetically. "I sold three just yesterday. But these here three's just as good. The others were bigger, that's all. I s'pose now you ladies don't want one that will hold say fifteen or twenty people?"

"We're not going into the Sunday School excursion business," I informed him. "We want one for our own use—if we buy at all."

"Exactly. You want one 'to hold anywhere from five to fifteen people in a pinch an' that'll ride the water as well with one in it. An' y'don't want her skittish. Now these here two boats's first, class boats but I'm goin' t' risk losin' a sale by bein' honest with you. These here two's too skittish fer ladies."

Then he dropped his voice an octave. "But this here one—ah!" He laid his hand on the gunwale of the third. "This here one has ally' want in a boat. She's steady an' reli'ble an' not too fast. I hate t'part with her, honest. I c'n sell her any day easier'n I c'n sell these here other two. She's what people are lookin' fer. But I'll always give'n honest opinion t' ladies."

He paused and beamed again.

"I'll tell y' somethin' else," he squeaked on; "but it's nothing against her. She's a bit second-hand. The man that owned her moved t' Toronto. He just hated t'part with her, but he wanted one that would do fer Lake Ontario. So he sez t'me, 'Sacrifice her fer a quick sale,' an' that's what I'm doin'. But somehow I hate t'part with her, f'r I've become sort of attached t' her. Seems almost's if she was human."

My desire to own this boat that was almost "human" increased in ratio to the regret in his voice. But, like a good buyer, I tried to keep that desire from showing in my face.

"Suppose," he suggested, "y'take a little spin out in her an' see fer yerselves how easy she runs?"

ALMOST HUMAN

BY AIMEE D. LINTON

Illustrated by Arthur Drummond

It sounded honest and we were impressed. Our faces, no doubt, admitted that much. He helped us into the boat.

As we swung out into the bay, I had already a far-advanced sense of possession. To hear her "put-a-put" through the water was an inspiring thing—a gas chant of triumph. She obeyed the obese man at the wheel in a model feminine way.

"Most motor boats have self-starters nowadays, haven't they?" I asked, more from a desire to suggest I knew something of motor boats than from any desire to find fault with this one.

"Just a mattera taste, Lady," he shrugged indifferently. "There's some wants those new-fangled things, but I c'n tell y'in confidence, Lady, there's mostly always somethin' goes wrong with 'em. An' when somethin' does go wrong with 'em, y've t'take t' the wheel anyways. So y'see, there's not much use havin' a self-starter, is there?"

Against the din of the engine his voice was low and soft,—that excellent thing in woman—and salesmen. I strained my hearing to catch all he said, for I wanted to know all the features of this desirable boat. In a few weeks they were so engraven on my memory that no shock could efface them.

"A child c'n turn this wheel," he went on as we turned again for his boat-house. "An' this engine can't be beat. She's as reli'ble as the Banka Montreal."

Then back at his boat-house the Fat One looked us over with seeming carelessness and remarked with "assumed casualness,

"I'm not goin' t'urge you t'buy this boat. She'll sell like Vict'ry bonds. But I don't mind sayin' that if you're goin' t'buy, I'd do it quick."

But I was cautious. I said that we'd consult with my brother first.

"What might your brother's name be, Lady?" he wanted to know.

I told him what it might be—and was. "Is Charlie your brother?" The tone in which he asked the question gave one the impression that he'd be glad to meet with any connection of Charlie's, even unto the third and fourth generation.

"Well, well!" he ejaculated. "I know Charlie well. Good scout, Charlie. Fine head on him. Tell you what I'll do, Ladies: I'll take a run out t' Charlie's to-morrow an' let him see the boat. He c'n have a spin in her an' see how she works."

We accepted his apparently generous offer and agreed on three o'clock next day.

Accordingly the next afternoon he arrived—some fifteen minutes late.

"Met a friend up the lake," he apologized effusively, "an' had a minute's chat with him. Guess I'm a bit late."

We said it didn't matter. It didn't—then.

With her engine cleaned, brass and grease cups shined and new oilcloth on the floor, she had little about her to suggest that she might be of an antique vintage. A new pennant fluttered from her stern.

My brother looked impressed. I guess we all did.

As I look back on it now with a memory sharpened by expensive experience, I can see that as much as anything it was that flag that sold that motor boat—and us. It's not, as a rule, the article as a whole which impresses the novice buyer; it is some one thing that will stand out from the ruck of attractions in bold relief. Red is popularly supposed to excite animals and lunatics. I hold that flag responsible for much!

Out on the lake, the Fat One duly instructed my brother in the mysteries of power boats. I stood at the wheel whose brass spokes shone and in a way which no one who was not a school teacher, such as I was, could perhaps fully appreciate, became entranced with the ready obedience it yielded to my hand. Later, I decided, I could learn from Charlie all there was to know of motor mechanism.

Charlie appeared to be progressing beautifully. He started her ahead and reversed her; he filled gas, priming and grease cups with facility and despatch; he turned off the switch and stopped her; he turned it on again and started her. The heavy wheel seemed to need only the touch of his hand to start her.

"Simple as A B C, ain't she?" the Fat One asked cheerfully. "Course now, it'd take some fellers a day'r two t' ketch on t' her workin's, but you seem to be a born mechanic."

"She doesn't seem too difficult," Charlie admitted, and there was a pleased grin on his face—like that of a cat when it is tickled behind the ears.

Then I remembered that Charlie knew as much about machinery as he did of Sanscrit.

On the run back to shore, the Fat One sat in the stern and discoursed feelingly to Molly on one's attachment for boats.

"Y'get t'be fond of 'em same's if they was human like," he stated among other things.

With Charlie as engineer and myself as pilot we ran into our harbor with a triumphant swirl. Just then we felt equal to running an ocean liner. But all exhilaration brings its penalty—and we paid for that.

In the pudgy palm of the Fat One we placed a cheque and he stepped into the trailer he had brought with him—a small skiff with an outboard motor. Afterward we realised that the presence of the trailer was sufficient evidence that the Fat One was an expert salesman. Too late we also realized that the trailer was the kind of boat we should have bought.

"A power boat," he admonished us at parting, "is just like a human bean an' their insides's about the same. Feed her with gas, flood her with oil, keep her carburetor clean, see that she gets water an' she'll go. That's all there is to 'em."

It sounded easy and oh, so very, very human!

"We can have some interesting times in this boat," Charlie remarked, as the Fat One disappeared round the point.

We had them all right, but they were not the kind we had in mind just then. Visions of fishing excursions, picnics and exploring jaunts stretched before us in dazzling array. The summer lay ahead in one long vista of cool, green retreats flanked by picnic baskets. Dreams—pipe dreams!

"We shall have to give her a name," I suggested; "something unusual."

But we never found a name unusual enough for her unusualness. There never was a name under heaven that could do justice to her vagaries. We started with "The Waterbaby" and ended with "The Diable."

At last we tore ourselves away from our new possession and paddled to camp in our excellent canoe, "The Suffragette."

And the evening was the first day.

NEXT day Charlie hurried through his work to take us out in the evening for a run in "The Waterbaby." With him came his wife and two little girls, the youngest of two tender years. I mention the fact not as merely in passing. What that motor boat failed to do for us by way of teasing uncertainty, young "Billy" provided in the matter of absolute certainty.

"Billy," corrupted from Wilhelmina, was a name not more than half suggestive of her hectic, meteoric temperament. Her years were the only tender thing about this small niece of mine. In form she was round and rugged; in movement she was a combination of an angle worm and a comet. Also, she possessed a terrifying originality and a fatal gift for inquiry.

For the first mile all went merry as a marriage bell—but much more noisy. At the time I accepted the roar of the engine as a manifestation of her perfection. Now I know that noise and perfection are no more associated with power boats than they are with human "beans." We were quiet and happy. Billy also.

For a mile she sat quite still. Perhaps she was overawed by a noise greater than any she had yet been able to produce. At the end of the mile, however, her subjugation broke down.

Unnoticed by any of us, she squirmed down and in a flash was on her way to her father at the engine. But she stopped at the revolving piston to investigate, hands outstretched to catch it.

Then Molly and her mother saw her. With a united shriek they made a mad dash for her. The father's eye caught the flutter of fast-moving figures and alighted on his baby. His arm shot out and down and Billy was grabbed by the seat of her rompers and laid face downward on the seat.

Billy lifted up her voice and wept. "Holy cats!" exploded Charlie, his eyes returning to their normal size. "That was a close one! You'll have to keep her caged up down there. I've all I can do to attend to the engine."

He had more than he could do—but he didn't know it then.

As for Billy, it would have been just as easy to keep a lively young gorilla confined to the restricted area of the stern of the boat. With tiny, intimated fists she pounded the wall of two pairs of legs placed across the seats to keep her in. She opened up the throttle of her lungs and rent the din-burdened air. She tried every sort of specious collusion known to her tender years and wore her two jailors to a frazzle. Though not in the storm centre, I felt my nerves crack.

"We are all right," I answered shortly, "but I'm sorry I can't say the same for that boat you sold us."

"Let's go in!" I screeched to my brother, two feet away.

He wearily agreed.

As we entered the channel of the creek which was our harbor, there was a bump. We had struck a sunken log in the creek bed. Charlie met my look of dismay with.

"That won't hurt her; she has a steel keel. This boat could hit a rock and not be hurt."

Her future career proved that rocks were of little account to her.

We all felt that our first cruise had not been one of unalloyed ecstasy. But perhaps the bad beginning augured a good ending.

We took them, as a concession, but we laughed. Her fear of the water was a joke in our family.

Charlie took several turns at the wheel and rose from his knees with a red, hot face.

"Seems to me that running that wheel is a man's sized job," Louise remarked sardonically.

"No, there's a knack to it," Charlie replied modestly; "I don't know the boat yet." Which was true; he didn't.

Two minutes later, in a sudden tipping of the boat, I thought I heard water rush to one side of her. But I dismissed the idea as absurd. Our "Waterbaby" could not have water on the inside!

When we had gone two of the five miles to town, the engine stopped. Then the boat stopped. Charlie looked puzzled, Louise both triumphant and dismayed.

a terrified screech. Learning that the explosion arose from natural causes, she delivered herself of a piece of her mind that passed understanding.

At the end of thirty minutes, the sweat rolling down his face, Charlie gave it up and we paddled to shore.

"Oh no, we didn't need the paddles, did we?" Louise jeered.

We reached the town in job lots by autos. Molly and I headed for the boat-house of the Fat One.

"Hare yuh, Ladies?" he inquired genially.

"We are all right;" I answered shortly; "but I'm sorry, I can't say the same for that boat you sold us."

His optical slits opened in innocent surprise. "Wot's happened?" His voice oozed anxious inquiry.

"That's what we want to know," Molly snapped. "We are not the doctor."

"Looks like a fit of the sulks to me," date, I fancy she'll run quite as well on land as on water," Molly made cryptic answer. "For the present, at all events, she seems to have a decided aversion to running on water."

"Do you know how to run it?" was Teddy's next question.

"There are some things hidden from the wise and prudent," Molly replied; "but we are living in hopes of learning something about her."

Nor were we disappointed in this—though how to run her was not one of the things we learned.

The Fat One stowed the five of us in his fast launch and while we drew three breaths we covered the three miles to the "Waterbaby."

"Is your boat as fast as this one?" Teddy asked between breaths.

"Temperamentally," Molly explained, "her nature isn't as fast as this one. The fat man in the bow says that ours is a human motor boat," she added.

Arrived at our boat, the Fat One began his diagnosis. He felt her pulse, looked at her tongue and took her temperature—or so it seemed to us.

"Y'don't think she got overheated, Charlie?" he asked finally.

Charlie took off his hat and scratched his head. "The sun is pretty hot," he admitted.

The Fat One's face expanded in a broad grin. "I don't mean that way. When y'run her full steam ahead all the time her engine's apt to get overheated."

His porcine form circumnavigated the engine a few times more. Finally he straightened up with a jerk.

"Why!" he exclaimed, "y'haven't the switch on?"

Under his breath Charlie said he'd be—something, which the others did not hear. I protested that the switch was on when she stopped. The Fat One explained that motor boats take a notion sometimes not to run, "but the spells don't last long," he added. "They're just like human beans."

"The point is, I snapped, "is she human enough to be made to go when the 'spells' are not on?"

He explained, with infinite gentleness in his voice, that one had to have patience with a power boat and, with a triumphant grin, admonished Charlie always to make sure the switch was on if he wanted her to go. Charlie looked foolish. But I wasn't satisfied and I entered another complaint.

"There seems to be water in her," I announced.

His expression of surprise showed every tooth he had. He took up the lovely new oilcloth on her floor and exposed her ribs. There was enough water inside her to drown a pup.

"Must of struck somethin'!" he declared with conviction.

I remembered the sunken log in the creek bed and spoke of it.

"That was it!" he ejaculated eagerly. "When y'hit that log, y'jarred her insides some ways. Acourse, all motor boats's more or less water in 'em."

"This one," I reflected, "seems to belong to the class which has more."

"It's their nature," he went on, "same's a dog's got fleas. Some says it's the vibration of the engine. But a little water don't hurt none; it does fine for ballast, but there's too much here. Y'see, a boat's more or less delict an' y've got to handle 'em bout's careful as if they was human."

"Do you suppose we broke one of her ribs?" I interrupted tartly. I was becoming tired of the human analogy.

"I don't hardly think so," he assured me. "It's just some triflin' thing that'll get all right in time."

I wondered if, on the principle of the old nursery rhyme, another bump in the same place would set it right.

THE Fat One saw us go merrily off and waved after us an insouciant hand in the dimpled palm of which lay a two dollar bill. Then he shot out of the bay in his own catapult craft.

In half an hour we had disembarked at the creek.

"What do you say, girls, to a trip to the north end of the lake to-morrow?" Charlie asked as we parted for the night.

We didn't say anything to it, for awhile. Already we felt fed up on the boat. But in the end politeness forced us to a display of eagerness we were far from feeling.

And the evening was the third day.

"If we are to keep cold wet cloths on her forehead," she remarked, "I see where my nursing talents may be turned to good account."

And the evening was the second day.

The next day, two friends being expected to visit us at camp, my brother and I decided to meet them in town by "The Waterbaby." It would be, we felt, the equivalent of a whole brass band. But my eldest sister advised going into town by auto. She had opposed our buying the motor boat in the first place.

"If you are tired of life, drown yourselves decently instead of risking death in a thousand horrible ways in a thing like that," she advised testily.

I resented her calling our "Waterbaby" a "thing" and, like Pharaoh of old, hardened my heart against her advice that day. But we all had to get to town. So, after many weather-searching looks at the cloudless sky and much loathing in her heart, she stepped aboard with the grim advice.

"Take all the paddles; we may need them."

"I told you that you can't depend upon these things!" she snorted. She would call it a "thing!"

"It's just stopped for a rest," I explained soothingly. "The man said it was just like a human being and I've read that machinery has to have a rest just like people."

"If it's so human, you might explain to it that this is a very inopportune time for it to take its rest," Louise sniffed sarcastically.

With infinite patience Charlie turned at the wheel. He turned seventy times seven—and then some. Finally he gave up turning and directed his attention to cups. He screwed the grease cups down; he glutted the oil cups with oil; he fed the priming cup with gas and opened it up. The engine expelled the gas with such force that Louise, who was then anxiously scanning the cloudless heavens for some sign of a storm, leaped into the air with

I appended. "We tried her with everything but candy and she wouldn't budge unless we paddled her. Do you suppose it's sunstroke she has?" I asked in an attempt at being facetious.

For a "slight consideration" he agreed to take us out after the train came in to where "The Waterbaby" reposed and declared we should find the trouble "some triflin' thing."

To our two friends just off the train, we explained the situation.

"A motor boat!" Judy exclaimed. "Well, you're not likely to find life either flat or stale from now on, though I predict you'll find it decidedly unprofitable."

"A motor boat!" Teddy was from an inland town and her ideas on anything connected with boats were more or less nebulous. "Is that one of those things that will run on either land or water?"

"Well, from what I've seen of ours to

OF all the intimate associations that flash upon memory's screen as we think of old times and back to "The Old Place" in the country or by the sea-shore which we called "home" in childhood no one thing stands out so distinctly as the old Well and the old well-sweep, and the "oaken bucket that hung in the well."

(Peradventure there were these accessories)

No path lives so vividly or so dearly in that same memory treasure-house as the little old winding path that led from the kitchen door to the well and back.

No journeys made since, whether great or little, at home or abroad, compare for impression with the journeys made along that same path, dewy and fresh in the early morning, cool and calming in the evening when first the misty shades of night began to look down upon the world out of cloud and over the hills, or if by the seashore over the soft and brooding bosom of old Ocean with its homing boats.

Wells! To many of us these may be nothing but dreams. But these dream-thoughts are the ladders of the soul. All through Canada from sea to sea, hanging on the well, they will awaken responsive memories and responsive hearts. For the Well not only was everywhere but IS everywhere. No home into which the Home Journal comes but will feel itself touched by memory of the old Well somewhere in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia.

Then there is the universality of the Well. It literally sweeps through the land from Atlantic to Pacific giving way as it were only to the Ocean.

Nor in reality does it stop at Canada but the Well sweeps around the world under the British flag uniting in a bond of well-being the many links of our great nation. Moreover the memory of the Well in their respective homelands is not forgotten by the New Canadians. It is in their treasure-house as in ours. It is a bond between us. Did we all but realize how in fundamental things we all share the same common things, so in memory's storehouse we have the same simple treasury we should feel ourselves nearer drawn to folk everywhere, whether they hailed to Canada from Iceland or from Timbuctoo.

Well, again. It must not be thought that in becoming so universal the wells of Canada sink their individuality. Far from it. Journeys here and there in Canada will show, if they show anything, that the well of Nova Scotia is as individual and different from the well of Quebec or the well of Ontario or the Far West as it could well be. And so there is never about the well that we remember the tedium of sameness. And in going about the country this summer it will be one of the things that "strike" us; this individuality and difference in "Wells" that neighbor each other.

There is the round "well" and the square, the deep and the shallow. The well that grandfather dug, the well that just seemed to grow. There always having been a "well" in that place Well! And what changes and what stirring events, dramatic to the degree that never seems to creep into plain history. How many a Canadian Rebecca has been possessed of a beauty surpassing Evangeline's yet for lack of a Longfellow has gone unsung. How many a "well" that we remember has yielded sweeter water than that by the willows of Grand Pre!

Yet because of the central place in the stage held of these we cannot do better than to look upon the Well at Grand Pre as godfather of all the wells in Canada

Yet of course before this Well there was a line of Wells and Well-sweeps reaching back to the dawn of Canadian history. Back to the Norsemen, the Basques, the Portuguese, the Gaels, the Colonial French in Cape Breton and Annapolis Royal, back to the aborigine Indian. One could take the well-sweep in hand as a huge quill pen with which to write the history of this great country of Canada from the earliest times down to now. The thought for us women in this sweep of time as well as in this line of wells is that for every "well" there has been at least one woman. And for the common well shared by a community many women. Women who have come and gone but while they went back and forth down the little path gave the human interest touch to these inanimate but atmospheric appendages to the households of Canada.

And as the well at Grand Pre reaches back so it reaches forward till now and continues with outstretched arm to project itself into the Canada to be. For we cannot imagine there will ever come the day when it will not be "well" with Canada.

HOW interesting and how dramatic a picture is presented by the many and various women who have tripped it back and forth to these wells, pails in hand. How many languages of heart and tongue have these old wells not heard. How many and various the women of the future who will seek to peer into the crystal Running water in our houses has come to be looked upon as a necessity. And remotest farm houses now boast labor and time-saving devices in connection with the water supply. And yet, and yet who wants to see the day when there is no "well" in Canada? Who wants to see the day when the well that grandfather dug and the well-sweep that he set up is no longer there in the old place?

Progress will get beyond being progress when we cease to care for the old well and its weathered arm against the sky-line. And when summer comes and the call of the out-of-doors is strong upon us, how pleasant it is for city dwellers following the call to hark back to "the old place, if for nothing else, 'just to see the old well,' just to wind up the old windlass and drink of the clean, cool water brought to hand in the old bucket.

The "well" is always of the country. Nothing in or of it breathes of the city. "Country" and the peace of the country is written in the "Well" and we only run across them far from the maddening crowd of city streets. The well-sweep is therefore to threadbare nerves and tired minds as a sweet magical wand, beckoning further and further to forgetfulness of the stress of life and business.

"Come with me, follow where my beckoning finger points" say the old well-sweeps of Quebec. "Follow me, and me," echo those of Nova Scotia, Cape Breton and the far Madeleine Islands. "Come out and see us" pipe the variations and modifications of the West.

So if one listens to these voices and follows the inclination and pull of memory we shall find ourselves in time hiking a most alluring road. The road of the Wells. It being one and the same as the road to health.

In the wake of the Wells, boon companions with them, in fact, one discovers good things to eat. The country that has wells has wild strawberries, raspberries, black-caps. Together with these go cows and plenty of milk and cream. A home-made churn sits under the benediction-arm of the well-sweep. They eye each other knowingly, these two of what we are pleased to call "the Old School."

In Quebec and no doubt elsewhere the old well is frequently made to serve as refrigerator by the market woman; and many a good thing besides water we have seen wound up out of the old well when Madame was bound to market, and in to town in her cart to sell her butter and eggs.

But of all the wells, give me the sea-coast well with half an eye cocked to windward. Its "sweep" aslant like a ship's Royal cleverly spilling the wind; or doing entirely without the well-sweep in the most exposed places because no "stick" could stand the gales the old "well" weathers.

In the wake of these sea-coast wells in addition to berries there is always fish. Nice fresh codfish and mackerel just caught and brought in by the boats. Live lobsters out of the lobster pots hauled every morning.

* * *

IT would seem that the sea and the wells must have a compact. Many of the wells are so close to the sea in the Madeleine Islands the spray must dash into them on stormy days were it not for box-covers, yet the tang of the salt never gets into the water as one would think. The well on its part always stands ready to serve those who go down to the sea in ships and—boats. When the fisherman's wife comes down to the well with her pail she stands a moment with hand shading eyes that the length of her vision may be extended to the furthest verge, trying to 'pick up' the little sail of her man's boat.

How many a tale of love and sorrow is dipped from the bucket of life by the women waiting on these wells. Imagine the flow of French that here wells from the lips of matron and maid when the storm brews and the mackerel fleet is still out!

But in summer weather when the sea is smooth and all the channels of the habitant life "running easy" how many a bit of gossip and news is here dispensed. How many a gay chanson is sung along the little path from the kitchen door. The path that is lost in the shingle of the beach or that leads across the fair rounded bosoms of the Demoiselles, where one picks mushrooms.

The wells of the West differ from the wells of the East in one particular. They are far removed from the path of the sea. Nevertheless they serve the Prairie home with the same rare faithfulness. However dry above, below the surface there is a well of water on tap.

To all the picturesque little homes of the foreign folk sprinkled in remote sections one finds the faithful "Well" the better ones looking as if they had been caught up as in the Titan hand of a giant Memory from among the parent wells of homes tucked in the country about the Carpathians and many a countryside from there to Iceland.

The New Canadians, dipping from these wells, find life as full as their sisters in every other part of Canada. But they might find it a little easier if like the women of Quebec they carried their two pails of water suspended from a wooden neck-yoke. Carrying water from the well with one of these homemade yokes leaves Madame et Mademoiselle's hands free to knit if they so desire. But chiefly it relieves the pull on the arms.

In British Columbia there is no dearth of water. If the old saying that "God loves the country to which he gives water" be true then indeed does He love British Columbia.

If it be Switzerland in its mountains, it certainly is in its beautiful lakes. And in the matter of rivers it would seem to have borrowed the map of Europe. The well in British Columbia under these conditions is not the same. In fact at first glance one might say it is not here at all. Nevertheless its machinery is here. The swift river whose torrential flow has worn itself a neat canyon cannot be reached easily with a bucket. And so the well's windlass has been set up on many a bank and the bucket guided by a wire travels back and forth between the river and the bank with the water welling in a rushing stream.

These are pioneer contrivances. The well in the original, was a pioneer contrivance in the Eastern and older settlements of Canada. That the same pioneer contrivance has been used in all ages and in all climes shows Canada in line with her wells with the best development. The well, just, grew naturally out of the need of the settler and the material at hand. A better contrivance could not have been arrived at. And despite improvements and changes the well and its usefulness still holds, not in one section but in every section. For picturesqueness on the countryside nothing is more attractive than an old well-sweep. And what appeals more to the imagination than a maid at the windlass on the bank of the Kootenay or the Columbia?

Through what fair scenes a quest of the wells of Canada has led us. Sitting by the well to talk awhile or asking a drink has often paved the way to acquaintance with most charming country folk of the old school. In Quebec there is the additional atmosphere created of the French language and the pails suspended from the homemade wooden neck yoke gracefully thrown over the shoulder. In Quebec the old wells melt in with the life and the landscape like the old Seigneurie mills and the wayside Crosses.

In Nova Scotia the Well-sweep with its weathered arms blends in just as artistically with the weathered shingles of the sea-side homes and the grey out-creeching rocks. All sketched in against a background of silvery sea. Were a questionnaire sent out as to the Province possessing the greatest number of Wells, I should think the heat of competition would be between the Provinces of Nova Scotia and Quebec. But after many years of interest in this subject of picturesque Canadian wells I cannot tell which of these two is the ranking Province.

And apart from usefulness, what could be more picturesque on the sea of grain as it rolls away from the train window or the flying motor car? If against the picturesque Silos in the landscape were seen the sails of an old Dutch windmill or the slanting arm of the weathered well-sweep from down Nova Scotia way?

The windlass on a river bank in British Columbia, drawing from a well that never runs dry.

Picturesque and Practical Wells in East and West

At the upper left will be seen an old well which has known much service in Manitoba. To the right is seen another Manitoba well at Conor, where an old Bukowinian is drawing water. The small scene beneath it is from Saint Margaret's Bay, Nova Scotia, and, if you look closely, you may note the little path leading to the well. The lower picture (left) shows a box covered well near the sea, at the Madeleine Islands. On the right is shown a sea-coast well of sentry-box type. Note the knotted rope which helps to keep the bucket from slipping back through old fingers. Below, is seen an old well-sweep in Nova Scotia. One of the beautiful old trees for which that province is famous, supports the sweep. These photographs were taken by Miss Edith S. Watson.

TAMARAC TURNPIKE

SNUFFLER, the cottontail, wasn't really hungry, but he kept nosing around in the little patch of white clover, trying to find a four-branched leaf.

"I see that you have lost something, Master Snuffler," said Chut-Chut, the black squirrel. "Don't worry. I'll help you to find it."

"I haven't lost anything," said the cottontail, "but I'd like to find something."

"Then let us go where there is something worth while finding," said Chut-Chut. "There is always something new along Tamarac Turnpike."

The little patch of white clover where Chut-Chut and Snuffler had met, was just at the upper border of a grove, a tiny forest, not more than a hundred yards across. There were trees of many kinds, but the tallest of these were the evergreens. The underbrush was dense, and across and through the grove a brook wound a lazy way.

As the two furry fellows turned and walked under the first branches, they entered upon a narrow path where the leaves, the grass, and the soft earth were padded down by the feet of the Little People of the woods. This pathway was Tamarac Turnpike.

The cottontail and the squirrel had just set foot upon the path when a dark nose was poked out through a grass clump, and a gruff voice said:

"There is no use in looking for anything, unless I tell you what to look for."

Snuffler knew that nose to belong to old Blinker, the mole. He did not believe that Blinker could tell him anything, but, knowing that it would please the mole, he asked: "Whom will we see if we keep our eyes open?"

"There is a wolf, an eagle, and a Daddy-Long-legs," replied Blinker.

"Not in this little woods," laughed Chut-Chut.

"Well then, there is a moose, a mouse, and a martin," said Blinker.

"That's more like it," said Chut-Chut. "But I don't think those are the ones we will find this morning along Tamarac Turnpike."

"I didn't say they were in the woods at all," said the mole. "But never mind, you have seen me. I'm the important one."

Blinker's nose disappeared in the grass-clump, and Snuffler said: "I wonder if we will see anything besides noses this morning. I hope we don't, for it would be such fun to guess to whom each one belongs."

The path was just wide enough to allow Snuffler and Chut-Chut to walk side-by-side. A branch of wild gooseberry bush brushed Snuffler's face, and as he held it to one side, he saw a nose, a tiny nose, a strange nose—a very funny nose, indeed. It was thin, and round, and shiny, and there was a little mouth right at the tip of it.

"Don't be so rough, Fuzzytail. You nearly shook me off."

The voice came from the little mouth, and Chut-Chut exclaimed: "He's talking through his nose, just like Coalie Crow. Who do you think it could be?"

"I know what it is, but I don't know who it is," replied Snuffler. "It's a weevil beetle."

"I'm the weevil beetle," said the chap with the long nose. "I am the Oak Weevil but just now I am visiting in the gooseberry bush."

"Yes," said Chut-Chut, "he talks through his nose."

The Oak Weevil was offended, and the long nose disappeared, but Chut-Chut only laughed as he and Snuffler walked on and along the pathway.

"This would be a nice, quiet place, if it wasn't for the squirrels and cottontails," said a sharp little voice, that Snuffler was sure came from a sharp-pointed object sticking out from amongst the leaves like a thorn.

"Squirrels and cottontails are such chatterers," continued the voice mischievously.

"You can't fool me," cried Chut-Chut. "You're Dodger, the woodcock, and you're just teasing us."

It was Dodger's long, sharp bill they had seen, and as that bill disappeared amongst the leaves, Chut-Chut and Snuffler heard the little bird chuckling to himself.

A small nose with bristly cat-whiskers almost frightened them as it popped around a small stump at the path's edge.

"I do believe that nose belongs to Old Judge Fuzzer, the bobcat," said Snuffler, and he winked at Chut-Chut.

"Oh, no!" said the black squirrel. "I think it looks like Master Marty Waddles, the toad, with whiskers."

it clung, a butterfly, the upper side of whose wings was almost as gay as a rainbow. The butterfly was a Crimson Underwing, and for a nose he had a long, slender trunk that curled up under his chin like a watch-spring. The butterfly said never a word, and the cottontail and his friend, the black squirrel, halted as Jewel, the ruby-throated hummingbird, called to them:

"I am the keeper of Tamarac Turnpike, and I warn you both that you can take no noses except your own with you from this woods."

Chut-Chut and Snuffler looked back at the little path, and Snuffler said: "Funny people, funny folks, Funny feet, and funny toes, Funny barks, and funny croaks, Always, too, a funny nose."

They entered upon a narrow path . . . padded down by the feet of the Little People of the woods.

The nose began to turn up more and more with indignation, until its owner could stand the teasing no longer and exclaimed:

"My nose like Warty Waddles? You'll tell me next that I look like Paddler, the tortoise."

"Why, if it isn't poor, little, homely Whitey Weasel!" said Chut-Chut. "Keep your nose out of sight, Master Whitey, and you won't hear so much said about it."

Chut-Chut spied the next nose. It was poked boldly out of a tree-hole some distance from the ground, and the cottontail guessed rightly the very first time. It was the bird-bill of Reddy Tip-Tap, the red-headed woodpecker. Reddy was at home, and must have been very busy, for he paid no attention to Chut-Chut and Snuffler, and never showed his red-head once.

They had almost finished their little journey along Tamarac Turnpike, when what seemed to be an old leaf fluttered down from a tree. It alighted on the bark of a stump beside the path. Here

Noses long, and noses thin,
Noses turned up, noses flat,
Noses pointed like a pin—
Who would want a nose like that?

Noses white, and noses blue,
Noses furry, noses bare;
But the nose that best suits you
Is the one you have to wear.

WHAT THE NESTS HOLD

THERE are few birds whose eggs are of the same color as the bird's feather coat. I often wonder which color they like best.

There is a charming way to plan a hunt for birds' eggs, not to take them from the nests, but to leave them in the surroundings where they are most beautiful. This plan is to search for nests which will contain only white eggs. After that, one may follow the rainbow colors from red to violet, the color chosen to be the most noticeable on each egg

Such a search takes one into all sorts of places. This you will find true as soon as you begin your first round of visits, which, as you have chosen white eggs to hunt for, may be in owl's nests. The little prairie owl who lives in a burrow the horned owl and the hawk owls who nest like crows in tree tops, the snowy owl who makes its home like a wild duck in the marshes, the noisy screech owl in his tree-hole home, and the barn owl with its nest under a roof or in a cave—all of them lay pure white eggs.

Tree swallows, and the tiny bank swallows, too, have eggs of pure white, while those of the purple martin, though white, are dull as if they had been rubbed so that they were no longer glossy. The search for white eggs would not be complete without a visit to the dainty home of the ruby throated hummingbird, and the sight of the two tiny, snowy eggs in the little nest should banish any thought of "egg collecting."

Who ever saw a red egg? When you begin at this end of the rainbow of color you must not look for scarlet shells, or globes of vermilion—you won't find them. The ground color of few eggs shows more of red than a pinkish tinge. Many are spotted and lined with brownish red or reddish brown, but we will not include these among the "red" eggs.

One of the best examples is the warm-hued egg of the osprey, or fish hawk.

Among blue eggs, that of the robin is the one we are most familiar with. It is not a true blue in color, like that of a bluebird, having, as most other "blue" eggs, a greenish tinge.

Green as a ground color seems to be, next to white, the most popular with the birds. The most sought after is that of the crow, perhaps because the nest is so hard to reach.

Your search will take you everywhere, and in addition to increasing your knowledge of birds' eggs, you will become better acquainted with the birds themselves, their habits, and their homes.

SOME TREE-HOLES

TREE-HOLES are always objects of interest and curiosity to me, as they are to my friend, Whitey Weasel, who, when he sees one, is never satisfied until he finds out what is in it.

You cannot always tell by looking at the tree-hole doorway who lives within. The woodchuck sometimes likes a home on the ground-floor of a hollow tree or stump, and the raccoon family prefer a tree-hole for a home.

The smaller tree-holes are by far the most interesting, because there are so many of the little outdoor-people who make their home in just such places. The squirrels, black, red, and grey, never think of choosing any other place in the woods for a winter store-house. The mischievous little chipmunk may usually be found at home in a hollow tree, and his store-house as well.

The birds who use a tree-hole doorway range from several of the owls, the little screech owls particularly, to the woodpeckers. In a class by himself as a tree-hole householder is that cheeriest, bravest, friendliest, little bird, the black-capped chickadee.

A tree-hole may be an entrance to a bees' nest where the wild bees build their honey storehouse. Such a tree-hole has a great attraction for old Paddytoes, the bear.

There is one inhabitant of hollow trees rather difficult to find, because he sleeps most of the day, and stays out most of the night. A hollow tree just suits Flitter, the bat, who spends most of the sunshine hours hanging from the ceiling of his house by his toes.

Of course, tree-hole doorways are most attractive when their owners show themselves to be at home. Grimmer, the woodchuck, sits by his doorway in the warm sunlight, combing his whiskers. A funny, little raccoon-face peers mischievously from his tree-hole window, or perhaps it is Reddy Tip-Tap, to see if any other "red head" is perching up on his favorite dead limb.

They're well worth looking into, these tree-hole homes, for most of those who live there are outdoor folk, the study of whose habits will repay over and over, the time and effort you may expend

These two beautiful photographic studies are taken by Mr. I. T. Parker, High River, Alberta, who has succeeded in catching the very spirit of pastoral charm. The upper scene is one of a characteristic Canadian atmosphere, showing the trees and water by which the cattle love to rest. The lower is a quiet stretch of stream "where patient willows keep a silent watch."

ONE evening, in early August, a sweet-faced young woman sat on an upturned soap-box at the door of her little home, in the far northern part of the Province of Manitoba.

There was no verandah. The transition step from the prairie to the shack was a low platform composed of five, long narrow boards, sun-beaten by seven summers, frost-eaten by as many winters save one.

On this platform, near the screen door, facing the south, sat Jean Alwyn. Away to the left were some dilapidated buildings, a stable, cow-shed and chicken-house. Beyond these, a sea of softly-waving grain grew dark and still.

A warm gentle wind played around the woman's fair hair and ruffled her tan-checked apron, as she sewed and dreamed.

She was mending a wide roll of old grayish-looking canvas which lay partly at her feet, partly over her lap. On the box beside her was a sweet-hay work-basket woven in soft shades of tan and green. It was an Indian basket she had brought from her old home in Toronto.

She stitched patiently in the twilight, strengthening here, patching there. When she stopped occasionally to refill the needle with strong linen thread, she would gaze for a moment at the endless acres of wheat that stretched into the serenity of the evening sky. The sun, a fiery ball, dropped lower and lower on her right. Something—it may have been the sweet hay basket—drifted her restless thoughts eastward.

It was just one short year since she had left her home in Toronto, full of youth's enthusiasm to make this little three-roomed shack the sanctuary of the Western song. She was prepared to miss many of the city conveniences, many of the city attractions. Instead of electricity's quick response to the light touching of a button, there would be old-time lamps to clean and trim. The nearest drop of coal-oil—the nearest store—would be six miles away; the post office, four. Mail would only come twice weekly. Neighbors would be few and distant. The shack would be isolated, but—with love brooding there—

She finished the last rent and let the canvas cover drop from her lap. It was all ready for the old binder, that wonderful bit of machinery that mows the ripened grain, gathers it up, rolls it around and ties it into bundles, tossing them out upon the ground, where they lie awaiting the stooker.

Arthur Alwyn had been devoting much time to his binder, spending hours on its examination and renovation. Often he called upon his wife to lend a hand for a minute. The hand always meant two, the minute never less than thirty. Time, a woman's time, means nothing in the West. Though it meant leaving her own work, Jean liked to help.

"Why do people have binder troubles?" she had asked that morning, while she stood in the hot sun, holding something in place for him. Man is a helpless individual when he has a wife.

"Weather," he answered briefly.

"Couldn't you put the machinery under cover when not in use?"

"Where's the cover?" He glanced at the cloudless pale blue ceiling. "If we were to buy lumber at its present sky-high price, haul it from town, pay Wilkins to help put up a shed, it would cost more than a new implement."

"But you would have the shed," she reasoned. "It would save all the machinery. I should think if it's worth having, it's worth protecting." She looked at plough and harrow, rake and seeder. They were being worn out without work.

"Nobody does it around here," he replied. That answer settled every point. It had, for months.

As the little woman mused, darkness fell. She entered the shack, groped around for the matches, took a lamp from a bracket near the door, lighted it and set it on the table. It cast a dazzle on the white oilcloth cover and a soft glow over the whole room.

THERE was a homey look about the apartment which did triple duty as kitchen, dining-room and general living room. It was large, about sixteen feet square. A few good prints graced the buff-coloured walls.

A big kitchen range occupied the centre of the west wall. On each side of the range was an open door. One led to a bed-room, the other to a tiny store-room. Opposite the range was an old-fashioned cabinet. An old brown lounge on the south side was banked with pretty cushions. On a little table near the lounge were some plants, sturdy dependable red geraniums and bright fuchsias, flourishing in tomato tins dressed in green tissue paper. There was a large table in the centre of the room and there were five plain chairs.

To the left of the window on the north side was a book-case, homemade of boxes. To the right was a low bench on which stood a couple of water pails. Jean walked over to look at them, though she knew their contents to a drop. One was quite empty, the other almost so. She thought of the barrel outside. It also was empty. She had taken the last painful two hours ago. She thought of the well. There was clear cold water in the well, and for the thousandth time the little woman wished it were nearer the house.

She heard wheels scrunching. The sound grew clearer as a waggon neared the house—then faded, as it proceeded stablewards. Presently a step sounded on the platform. The screen door creaked opened and her husband entered. He had been to the store for harness repairs. He was a man of medium height, thin and dark with fine clear cut features. The somewhat low narrow forehead, indica-

"We'll have to afford it. It's cheap to the grain. Last year McDonald lost his whole summer fallow crop, dangling around with his old binder, rushing to town three times in four days for repairs just when weather and wheat were a perfect combination."

He sat down to read the newspapers. She lit another small lamp, went into the bedroom and seated herself on a low rocker near the bureau. Presently she drew her chair closer, opened the lower drawer and gazed long and wistfully at the neatly arranged piles of little things—all white—dresses, nighties, slips and bands. Only the tiny crocheted booties and knitted sacques had a touch of colour, pale pink and baby blue. Most of these things had been bought with the egg and butter money. A few were presents from friends in the East. She fingered the outfit reverently. She looked up as her husband came in.

"It's a pity you've spent so much money," he said. "The things mightn't be needed, you know. First babies don't often live—not around here anyway."

It was mail night. Arthur Alwyn stabled his horse and entered his house. He tossed the Grain Growers' Guide and several newspapers on to the kitchen table, lighted the lamp and blew out the smoky lantern. He sat down and gazed at the tive of a slight narrowness of mind, was offset by the eyes which were singularly good.

"Binder twine's coming tomorrow, Jean. I'll have to make town again in the morning. Thirsty as a fish. Where's the dipper?"

"Here, but there's no water, Arthur, except a little in the kettle. The barrel is empty too."

He felt the kettle, found it cold and poured himself a drink.

"Empty again! Only three days since I filled it. I can't imagine how you use so much water. When I was alone, a barrel lasted me for weeks."

"The butter drinks it up. I churned this evening."

"Well, I'll draw some before I leave, but there won't be much time for chores like that now. The grain is beginning to ripen."

"Yes, I've been noticing its golden tinge. The canvas is finished—rolled up outside. I think it will hold splendidly."

"Too bad you mended it," he replied. "I'm going to get a new binder."

She looked her amazement. Arthur had money—but not to spend.

"A new binder! Can we afford it?"

cluttered room. The place seemed lost. The floor was unswept—the stove red rust in circles. Unwashed dishes were heaped on the table in a great disorder. Though this had been the chronic condition of the room in olden days, it had somehow then never seemed quite so empty. Something was missing now.

He thought of his wife in the hospital. He wished she had stayed at home. He had been somewhat averse to her going away, but when they had talked the matter over, they had decided that the little hospital, eighteen miles to the south, would be better, perhaps cheaper in the end. She was doing nicely now. He had phoned daily since leaving her. She would soon be home. He must find out when she could come. Perhaps he might write to her. That brought to mind the letters in his pocket. He pulled them out. There were three. Two were uninteresting, mere advertisements, boldly proclaiming on the outside, their internal affairs. The other was a small plain envelope, addressed in a clear, neat handwriting. He could make nothing of the blurred postmark. He opened the envelope deliberately and drew out two double sheets of closely written notepaper. The letter began without the usual statement of time and place.

Dear Father,
The man started. This wasn't for him after all. It was a mistake. He drew the envelope towards him and read again—

Mr. A. R. Alwyn,
Prairie town,
Man.

Puzzled, he returned to the letter—Dear Father,—

That's a pretty big word!
I keep saying it, Father, Father.
I like the wonder of it.

Well, Father, here I am at last. I arrived on a Sunday morning, about five o'clock. At least the nurses say so. I don't know very much about it. For awhile nobody knew whether I was going to stay here or not. I didn't know myself, but after a bit, I decided to give this cold, queer old world a chance, and I wailed feebly.

I've got rather a nice little cry. So they say. I am working hard at it, getting it stronger and more insistent, so I think by the time I come home, you'll consider it a mighty howl.

The word "Home" feels good. I don't know what it is yet, but it sounds safe, safe and comfy. At first I thought it was just being close to Mother, but now I know it isn't. She whispers to me so much about "Home" that I'm longing to see it.

I've been wondering a great deal since I came here, Dad, about ever so many understandable things—where I came from and why, and if—if you really, really wanted me. You see I'm quite a little philosopher. I hope to be a bright, cheery one and do my best, now that I am here, to be a good son to you and Mother.

I'm like you in looks and ways. Mother says so, and she ought to know. I've torn the sleeve of one nightie already. "Just like your father," she said, "and not even the barbed wire excuse!" But she said it as if she would just love to stitch it up. I think I'll tear the other sleeve to-night.

Mother seems to like me very much and she dreams so often about you that I think she likes you too. She likes my ears, because they're small and dainty. That sounded like a very foolish remark to me, Dad, but feminine! you know, and so motherly. This understanding of people is going to be quite a business. Now even though they are my very own ears, I don't care whether they're big or little. What I like about them is that they let me hear.

You'll be surprised at all I've heard. The night nurse says I'm a fine little fellow. The head nurse says I'm a prize baby. The lady in the room across the hall says she would love to keep me. (Her little baby didn't stay—not even a minute!)

The Doctor comes in every day to see Mother and me. He says every farmer's wife in Manitoba works too hard. He says the men don't realise it. One day I heard him mutter something low-down about wheat. What is wheat?

It is half-past ten now. The lights will soon be out, so I must hurry. I am very anxious to see you, Dad, for, after Mother, I love you best of anybody. I'm going to need you very much. There is a great deal to learn, but with Mother and you to love and lead me, I'll be all right. I just know I will.

The head nurse is writing this for me. She cuddles me very often and seems to understand what I want to say.

Good-night,
From your own little Son

Two days later Jean Alwyn propped up with pillows sat in a Morris chair at the open window of the hospital ward, looking out upon the bare attempt at a garden.

The head nurse entered, the usual bright smile on her understanding face. She had a letter in her hand. She dropped it into Jean's lap, with a laughing word, moved her chair slightly, lowered the blind a few inches, and walked away. Jean looked at the familiar writing, then tore the envelope open in eager haste, and read—

Dear Jean:
I phoned your doctor this morning and made arrangements for you and Baby to stay on at the hospital for another few days. Glad you are both so well. Keep gaining. I'll be over for you in Watson's car on Wednesday afternoon.

Your hair can be improved by one of these tested treatments

Different types of hair need different treatment. There is a special treatment that will bring back beauty to yours. Are you using the right treatment?

HAIR that is oily, dry, brittle, dull and without lustre, full of dandruff, or thin and falling — one of these may be your misfortune.

But now it is known that practically all hair troubles come from one source—that oil in the scalp called Sebum.

And now that the cause is known, its ill effects can be removed. There is a special treatment for your type of hair that should make it respond almost at once.

Your general health, of course, affects your hair, but it is now known that most of all hair troubles come from a local scalp disorder.

For many people in good, general health, suffer unattractive hair. Your scalp is a separate organism and must be treated separately.

Sebum—that oil in your scalp which is the cause of most hair troubles—is the oil that nature uses to give your hair its silky gloss and life.

So, when your hair is healthy it is the boon of your hair and Nature's beautifier. But like other skin secretions, it is often in excess. Then your hair gets oily and dandruff and scales may follow. This is the danger signal. For Sebum, once exposed, decomposes quickly. If neglected, it becomes the chief source of harm to your hair. It forms fatty acids which, held in contact with the scalp, inflame it and in most cases if allowed to continue, burn away the tissue, and kill the hair root.

Scales and dandruff choke the hair follicles. This, with lack of stimulation, suppresses the oil. Then comes dry hair that is brittle and dead looking.

The first step, of course, is the same as in any skin disorder. Remove this surplus and purge the pores. But you must dissolve the Sebum—remove it. Not with ordinary soaps—they are often too harsh—but with scientific tested methods.

Our chemists have evolved in Palmolive Shampoo the best way that is yet known to do this. This is the first essential. Combat this Sebum oil regularly, scientifically. Don't rely on guess-work or untested treatments. Your hair means too much to you.

The next step is to bring out the natural lights and lustre in your hair. To give it a softness that makes it feel like silk when you touch it.

To do this our chemists have mixed with this shampoo a matchless blend of Palm and Olive Oil. Nothing throughout the ages has ever compared with these, as Nature's aid in bringing out the glories of your hair. And in fitting the scalp to

CANADIAN NATIONAL EXHIBITION

AWAY back in the year 1879, when Queen Victoria had been reigning for forty-two years and the Dominion of Canada was only twelve years old, the city of Toronto determined to acquire an Exhibition Park. Of course there had been fairs in Toronto which had delighted those who dwelt there in the 'sixties. Tom Thumb and the Wild Men from Borneo had been among the attractions and many an old Torontonian can tell you tales of the days when there was no grown-up Exhibition.

Let us turn our attention to cold facts for a moment, since, to speak in paradox, they will warm the heart and the imagination. In the year 1879, the Exhibition property included one-hundred-and-twenty acres of land and buildings worth about $120,000. Now it means an expanse of two-hundred-and-sixty-four acres, valued at $5,000,000 and eighty buildings worth $6,000,000. Wrought in stone, brick, concrete and steel, the massive structures command admiration through the impression they give of beauty and permanence. Cupolas, minarets, spires and domes lend them an inviting aspect and the buildings look what they are, vast show cases of a nation's product. Perhaps the most striking of the newer structures are the Pure Food building and the Coliseum, the latter the largest single building ever erected on a permanent fair grounds, having eight-and-a-half acres under roof. Its total cost, including equipment, was $1,500,000.

Now that you have imbibed some of the stimulating cold facts, let us turn to the picturesque background for all the shifting scenes of a nation's work and play. There is a stretch of a mile of waterfront, with the broad sweep of Lake Ontario, smiling in sapphire serenity or turning to stormy grey beneath a cloud-swept sky. "Silver sails, all out of the West" come swiftly across the waters or the swifter and more practical motor boats leave a foamy path. If you become bewildered by the variety and vastness of the human achievement, as shown in the swarming buildings, you may wander down to the waterside and enjoy as fair a prospect as Ontario, the province of wide waters, can spread before you.

The grounds have been carefully and picturesquely planned by landscape gardeners who were artists and who understood the greatness of their undertaking. The Exhibition opens on the second Saturday before Labor Day and extends into September, wherefore, it has the richest coloring of the year in crimson, purple and golden blooms, with the fresh green of foliage giving us to realize that it is summer still. There is always a wonderful flower exhibit in the Horticultural Building; but nothing is more glowingly impressive than the floral display in the park itself. For this reason, no one feels that the Exhibition is a mere "show." It has the suggestion of rest and home, as well, in its shady paths and spreading flower-beds.

How has "the Exhibition," as Torontonians always call it, developed into a national, virtually an international affair, from its comparatively modest beginning? The citizens of Toronto, themselves, will be the first to admit that the Exhibition has owed much to the spirit of the Dominion. Canada does not easily become enthusiastic. If not always "Our Lady of the Snows," she is certainly a Lady of Deliberation, who weighs the merits of any movement, before affixing the stamp of her approval and buying a railway ticket in proof of her belief. However, when Canada is convinced, she has the courage and the practical co-operation of her conviction and will go far and spend much, in support of an enterprise which has proved worth while. Hence, every year sees increasing numbers from the nine provinces, pouring into the capital of Ontario for the fortnight of the Canadian National Exhibition.

A word or two might be said here, as to the especial advantages of Toronto as the scene for such a super-show. Toronto is within a night's ride of the large United States centres, from Chicago on the West to Philadelphia and Boston on the East. It is only three hours' journey from Niagara Falls, by steamers of palace proportions. So, many can enjoy a summer trip to Toronto, the spectacle of a World's Fair and a pilgrimage to one of the marvellous expositions of Nature's force and majesty:—all during the same fortnight. The "sights" of Toronto themselves are worth seeing:—and among them, please do not forget the Royal Ontario Museum where treasures from many lands and centuries form an historical exhibition of which any province or country might be proud.

THE "public" nature of the C.N.E. must not be forgotten. It belongs to the people, is owned by the city of Toronto, and the surplus revenue goes into the public treasury. It is directed by men of prominence and probity, including some of Canada's greatest workers, who give their services gratuitously. To be a member of the Exhibition Board is to receive a certificate of business ability and civic honor. It is interesting and gratifying to notice with what enthusiasm the members of the Board toil for the Exhibition and how fervently their efforts increase as the figures of attendance rise to the million mark and pass it.

Many distinguished visitors have left an abiding impression on those who have attended the Great Fair:—and many a man, great in the councils of the Empire, has opened the long-awaited event. In the romantic interest, the visit of His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, in 1919 was the most memorable inauguration the Exhibition has known. No one who saw and heard those cheering crowds and witnessed the gracious and appreciative response of the golden-haired Prince will forget those thrilling August days. There was the reaction from the long war strain in the tumultuous gladness of the welcome:—and the Exhibition of that year saw an imperial greeting to a royal guest.

The long list of those who have opened the Exhibition would show the variety included in the various departments of the C.N.E. Statesmen, soldiers, manufacturers, legislators and inventors have launched the annual fair, to the cheers of assembled thousands. Last year the attendance was 1,242,000 people in thirteen days. Who will say that thirteen is an unlucky number after such a record? In this immense crowd, nine Provinces of the Dominion, thirty-six States of the Union, New Zealand, Australia, the British Isles and several countries of Europe were represented. Does not such a wide and varied display of interest prove the mettle of the Board of Directors? Only ability, enthusiasm and integrity could have produced such results:—and the future of the Exhibition will be assured only by such efficient and loyal service as the past has known. The President, Mr. Robert Fleming, and the Managing Director, Mr. John G. Kent, are worthy members of a long line of notable officials.

THE progress of Canada is mirrored in the show case of the C.N.E. Think of what it was like, back in the 'eighties (if you can think so far back) when we regarded it chiefly as a paradise of popcorn and bright balloons. Canada has travelled far since then and the journey has been marked by the mile-stones of the C.N.E. We have no desire to take a fling at the past, but it is generally admitted that the last thirty-five years have seen an unprecedented development in scientific invention:—especially in all that relates to agriculture, transportation and transmission of sound. The telephone was a mere infant in 1879 when Toronto put her hand in her pocket and made the Exhibition all her own. To-day we are talking across continents and radio concerts are ours for the "listening in." Think of the housewife of 1879 standing before the modern electric washing-machine and wondering why this labor-saving aid to good housekeeping had not made an earlier appearance!

Machinery Hall is a revelation of how the wheels are going round in the world of industry, and you find the latest devices, to save toil and increase production, in this vast display. However, the machinery is but one feature in the great show of modern industry. When you visit the agricultural buildings, you feel as if Canada were one huge farm with barns filled to overflowing. When you come to the building which shows our wealth of minerals, you are astonished to find what the Dominion possesses in such wealth:—and in such varied forms. To attend the C.N.E. should be, for any thoughtful Canadian, a revelation, such as would not make him foolishly boastful, but properly sensible of his heritage and his responsibility.

Let no one imagine, for a moment, that the lighter side of life has been forgotten. It is not an easy matter to have a Midway and side shows which will please all and offend none! The Exhibition authorities have had wonderful success in securing clean entertainment, and seldom is the voice of the censor heard from the grand stand. Every year, the youngest citizens look forward joyously to the "fun of the Fair," and are never disappointed

ONE of the most educative features of the C.N.E. has been the development of its art exhibition. The building devoted at present to art has admirable galleries where hundreds of pictures are exhibited every year. Paintings of great merit have been brought annually from abroad and have proved a delight and inspiration to thousands of spectators. Collections of various kinds have also been shown, and authorities in many lands have shown remarkable generosity in lending articles of value. Applied art also has its place, and a marvellous advance in artistic ideals may be noticed from the early displays to the dignified productions of to-day. In painting and sculpture the work is of a high order, and Canadians need not fear for the future in artistic achievement. Artists have been generous in advice and assistance that the Exhibition might be worthy of a national and international place:—and they have their reward in the steady advance of creative and original type.

Music has always been a feature of "the Fair"—and that subject is appropriately dealt with in another article in this issue of the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL in which Mr. Hector Charlesworth tells of how the C.N.E. has contributed to the melody and harmony of the Dominion.

There is, naturally, a great educative side to the C.N.E., but there is no ostentatious effort to "bring up the public" or to force the information side of any display upon the spectator. Competitions of various kinds add interest to many exhibits. This year there will be motor boat and yacht races, automobile races and auto polo; hippodrome and vaudeville performances; a giant midway; the most picturesque fireworks and other spectacular displays. In fact, the C.N.E. is a wonderful combination of general interest and special attractions. In front of the grand stand is given each night a

The automobile has made the farmer a country gentleman and the farmer's wife a woman to be envied by her city sisters. "The isolation of the farm" exists today only in the imagination of those whose travels are confined within the narrow limits of some urban centre, or whose knowledge of the country is gained from the windows of a Pullman car.

All over Canada the farmer and his family take full advantage of the automobile to enjoy pleasures popularly supposed to be the sole prerogative of city dwellers.

Nor has the hired man been forgotten. The efficiency of the Ford car has paved the way for the Fordson Tractor, which shortens working hours on the farm.

There are those who from purely sentimental reasons, regret the passing of the horse, but in farming, as in every other business, results count, and results are so overwhelmingly in favor of the automobile and tractor, that the motorized farm is here to stay.

Those Little Extra Rooms

BY COLLIER STEVENSON

INTO the planning of the average home, however small, certain rooms invariably enter. A kitchen, for example, and a living room are quite inevitable. Halls and bedrooms, too, must be included; whether or not a dining room, a laundry or a billiard room be provided at the outset. And that is all quite as it should be—for is it not distinctly the part of wisdom to first make sure of the actual necessities before striving for the more luxurious things of life?

In the case of a new house, when all the various rooms that cannot be dispensed with have been definitely planned furniture that never was and never could be beautiful, of utter banalities in bric-a-brac and pictures. If, then, sentimentality be responsible either for any unused rooms or the continued use of furniture and furnishings that offend our sense of good taste, let us stifle it, once and for all! For, unless we do, sentimentality is apt to run riot and measurably lower both the decorative standard and the general livableness of the home.

In determining the function which any existing room is to perform or in planning a new room to serve a definite purpose, it is desirable—necessary, indeed, if the room is to be truly successful!—to consider for, the less necessary but equally desirable rooms can appropriately enter into consideration—a breakfast room, perhaps; a den, a sewing room or a dressing room; a diminutive library or a morning room. And, in many of our older houses, there are little extra rooms—rooms, possibly, that have either never been put to satisfactory use or have gradually fallen into complete disuse—which but require the addition of fresh furnishing and artistic adornment to promote their greater utilization.

Sometimes, too, because it may be especially associated with a member of the household long gone but still revered, a room remains with bolted door year after year: serving no useful purpose, benefiting neither the living nor honoring the dead. We, perhaps, are tempted to condone this futile waste by attributing it to gentle sentiment. Now sentiment is an excellent thing to cultivate and cherish: but, all too frequently, that which we think is sentiment is merely sentimentality. And sentimentality can properly play no part in the creation and embellishment of the modern home!

Sentimentality—certainly not any true sentiment! it is that leads to the perpetuation in our homes of all the unrelated gifts of well-meaning friends, of family very carefully the matter of exposure in relation to use. In illustration, let us cite the breakfast room. As it is intended exclusively for morning use, obviously the breakfast room should, under ideal conditions, have a South-East exposure, as that assures sunlight both for breakfast and luncheon. For the morning room—that informal little sitting room, which is so generally used and appreciated in the English home but all too rarely planned for here—the South-East aspect is, of course, equally to be desired.

Turning now to other possible utilizations, a little extra room can be advantageously converted into a sewing room, boudoir or dressing room: and, in relation to any of these uses, what exposures could be better than a South or South-West? Either of these aspects is certain to impart cheerfulness during the afternoon—and it is probably then that the use would be most frequent. Sometimes, however, a North exposure is preferred for a sewing room, just as for a studio, in order to secure an "even" light throughout the day. It is fortunate, then, that, even with a North or a North-East exposure, a pleasant sunniness of effect can be achieved by the right choice of color-scheme.

Again, if our little extra room is to be utilized as a den, a writing room or a library, sunlight need not be a particular factor—although, if the sun can be enjoyed, so much the better!—for the use of the room will to a great extent be confined to the hours after nightfall. And, as the tendency in any room especially dedicated to masculine occupancy is usually decidedly towards a warmth and cheerfulness of coloring that can be depended upon to counterbalance an entirely sunless exposure, even a direct North aspect is, then, not in the least inappropriate.

Rough, "sand-float" plaster in its natural grey-white coloring contrasts effectively with the dark brown woodwork of this unique attic den. Apart from the unusual timbering of the ceiling, the only notable architectural feature is the high fireplace of white-jointed red brick. The furniture is, appropriately, of Craftsman type in brown oak, cushioned in brown Spanish leather. Navajo blankets, chiefly in a striking combination of red, black and white, bring into the room some brilliant bits of color.

THUS far, we have touched only upon the informal uses of the little extra rooms of a house. A small room can, however, serve a formal purpose no less acceptably. It can, for instance, if suitably situated, be satisfactorily used either as a reception room or music room. Even in a very simple home, there are times without number when a reception room, adjacent to but quite distinct from the living room, is a veritable boon. Formal visitors and callers on business bent can be received there without encroachment upon the living quarters: and, on festive occasions the extra space provided by the reception room can be used to good advantage. A music room, even if very small, is scarcely less useful: it not only creates a suitable environment for the uninterrupted enjoyment of music, but safeguards the quiet of the living room—if any member of the household happens to be in the throes of long hours of piano practice. The exposure of the little rooms thus formally

The nut-brown woodwork of this diminutive den has a pleasant foil in the light tan walls, which are finished with flat paint. A two-toned rug of brownish-taupe forms an interesting floor-covering. The furniture is of brown-stained oak and the chair-coverings are of velour in a brown-and-blue changeable coloring. The lighting fixtures are of glowing copper, with simple silk shades in golden-brown over orange.

Anecdotal

It happened during the early days of the war, but it's just as good now.

A member of the local council of defense had hired an enthusiastic small boy to put up some posters he had received the day before. The youth was instructed to cover every vacant space he could find with a poster.

All went well until noon, when an indignant old gentleman stamped into the office and demanded to know what that boy was trying to pull off anyway, and insisted that the council member accompany him.

There in the cemetery, on the side of the mausoleum which contained all the mortal remains of one of the city's fathers, was emblazoned the command: "Wake up! Your country needs you!"

technical evidence. The opposing counsel was inclined to be sarcastic at the idea of so young a doctor being called.

"You are familiar," he said, "with the symptoms of concussion of the brain?"

"Yes," said the doctor.

"Then, if Mr. Smith and myself collided, and banged our heads together, should we get concussion of the brain?"

"Mr. Smith might," said the doctor.

Cuthbert had been listening for half an hour to a lecture from his father on the evils of late nights and late risings in the morning.

"You will never amount to anything," said the father, "unless you turn over a new leaf. Remember, it's the early bird that catches the worm!"

"Ha, ha!" laughed Cuthbert. "How about the worm? What did he get for turning out so early?"

"My son," replied the father, "that worm hadn't been to bed all night; he was on his way home!"

Mr. Gregory Stroud, who has made such a success in Sally at the Winter Garden Theatre, London, tells a story of two doctors in a country town, the one elderly, who had a long record of cures, and the other young, who had his record still to make, but the older doctor was rather inclined to hand over some of his night work to the younger man. One bitterly cold night the former was called up by two farmers from a hamlet about eight miles away, the wife of one of whom

BLACKHEADS GO QUICK

BY THIS SIMPLE METHOD

Blackheads—big ones or little ones—soft ones or hard ones—on any part of the body, go quick by a simple method that just dissolves them. To do this get about two ounces of Peroxine powder from your druggist—sprinkle a little on a hot wet sponge—rub over the blackheads briskly for a few seconds—and wash off. You'll wonder where the blackheads have gone. The Peroxine powder and the hot water have just dissolved them. Pinching and squeezing blackheads only open the pores of the skin and leave them open and unsightly—and unless the blackheads are big and soft they will not come out, while the simple application of peroxine powder and water dissolves them right out, leaving the skin soft and the pores in their natural condition. You can get Peroxine powder at any drug store and if you are troubled with these unsightly blemishes you should certainly try this simple method. If your druggist is unable to supply you with Peroxine, send one dollar to the Fred. W. Scarfe Company, 424 Wellington Street, West, Toronto, and they will send you enough Peroxine to last several weeks.

Not wishing to go, and thinking to put a convincing argument before them, the doctor said, "Very well, but in that case my fee is two guineas, payable now," and in spite of all the remonstrances of the farmers the doctor was obdurate. At last the one whose wife was ill said to the other, "Well, what do you think I ought to do?" "Oh," was the reply, "I think you'd better pay him the two guineas. The funeral would cost you more."

A clergyman once told a story concerning a man he had approached for a contribution towards the church funds. No amount of persuasion would make the man give anything, and at last he said to him, "Why not? Isn't the cause a good one?" "Yes," answered the man, "but the fact of the matter is I owe too much money. I must be just before I'm generous, you know." "But surely," said the clergyman, "you owe your Maker a larger debt than you do anybody else?" "That's true," was the reply, "but then He isn't pushing me like the rest of my creditors."

Once at a certain assize held in the south of England the jury could not agree, and were accordingly locked up. A long and animated discussion followed, after which a division was taken, when ten were found to be for conviction and two for acquittal. Then followed another long and acrimonious debate, and at length a big, burly farmer who was leading the majority went over to the very diminutive individual who with a companion formed the minority, and said in his most blustering tones, "Now, then, are you two going to give in?" "No," emphatically replied the small man. "Very well," was the answer, "then us ten will." And they did.

Peace

Ned has taken a policy with the London Life. He has passed the medical examination with flying colors. The doctor has made certain suggestions for the future, that will help him to retain his present vigor for another thirty years, and live to a ripe old age. He is now thirty-one. His participating policy is a twenty-pay life for $5,000.00

Profit

The premium for his policy is $169.50, but Ned has been studying London Life records. On a policy similar to his own (taken in 1888 by another fellow) the increasing profits were used to greatly reduce the premium, so that the average amount payable each year over the twenty years was but $119.21 and in addition during the fifteen years since 1907 when the policy became paid up he has received in cash dividends, $843.30. The net cost of his $5,000.00 policy over the whole period was but $1,540.85.

Pleasure

$5,000. for his darlings—bought and paid for by a third of that sum—why, it was like trebling his money! Ned knew that the practice of estimating profits on a policy was no longer in force. BUT—since the audited accounts of the London Life prove that it paid steadily increasing profits to participating policy-holders, even during the Great War; that sound Canadian Securities (mainly bonds and first mortgages) are its chief assets; that it exceeds the Government requirements for Reserves by nearly $1,000,000 — well, Ned felt that a policy-holder was justified in calculating from established facts.

Protection

Thirty-four years of protection and after that a yearly dividend for the rest of his life. (Bar accidents there was no reason why Ned should not live as long as This Other Fellow, who was still going strong.) And always—whether he lived six months or sixty years, there would be that $5,000. ready in the hour of their greatest need—for his wife Nellie, for Dollie, for Buster and Baby Rose.

Ned was so pleased he explained the whole thing to Nellie.

See next issue for what Nellie thought of it and how she took it.

Thirst Quenchers for Hot Days

BY FRANCES M. McNALLY

SOMETHING to drink is one of our constant demands, especially in the hot days of summer. Thirst is not a fad or an imagination, but a natural cry of the body for water. While water is not a nutrient it is rightly classed as one of the five food principles, for without it the functions of the body could not be performed. It is needed to eliminate waste, to carry nutritive material where it is needed and to regulate body temperature. The human body is composed of seventy-five per cent. water and this amount must be rigidly kept up if we are to be healthy. Water is a universal beverage and the ideal one when it is pure, clear and cool. It quenches the thirst much better than most of the concoctions which are produced to take its place. However one cannot always offer one's guests or even one's family plain water to drink and what to serve to the unexpected caller or at the more formal porch party or summer luncheon often becomes a problem.

freshly drawn water just at the boiling point and second, a clean dry heated tea-pot. At the first bubbling of the water, rinse the tea-pot and let it stand for a moment on the stove to dry, put in the tea leaves and pour over them the rapidly boiling water. Put on the cover and let stand five minutes. For iced-tea use a larger portion of tea to water than when the tea is to be served hot. Pour from the leaves after the usual five minutes, directly over the cracked ice in glasses. Serve with lemon. Tea poured from the leaves and left to chill in the ice chest is apt to become cloudy in appearance and to lose some of its flavour.

Probably the most popular of the summer beverages are the Refreshing Fruit Drinks. Most of these are easily prepared and few utensils are required. A glass pitcher, a sharp knife, a plate, a lemon reamer, a strainer, an ice-pick or strong darning needle are all that are necessary. A few general rules should be kept in

Fruit Punch

Beverages are of three classes, the nourishing, the refreshing, the stimulating. The nourishing beverages usually have a foundation of milk and are of the greatest value in the diet of the sick. Some of them however may be very acceptable, served ice-cold to the family or guests on a hot summer day. Properly prepared, and served they will be refreshing as well as nourishing. A few examples of such beverages are:—

ICED COCOA:—Two tablespoons Cocoa, one tablespoon boiling water, one cup hot milk, one teaspoon sugar. Mix the cocoa, the boiling water and sugar and boil two or three minutes. Add the hot milk, remove from fire and cool, when cold place in ice box next to the ice. Serve when thoroughly chilled. Never place ice in cocoa. It dilutes the milk and takes from the richness of the mixture.

COCOA FLOAT:—To each cup of thoroughly chilled cocoa, add a heaping teaspoon of vanilla or chocolate ice cream, or if preferred a teaspoon of stiffly whipped cream, or marshmallow cream, topped with a cherry.

CHOCOLATE MILK SHAKE:—Two tablespoons of chocolate syrup, three tablespoons whipped cream, one-half cup of Milk, one-quarter cup of plain soda water, or apollinaris water. Place all ingredients, except the charged water, in a sealer and shake thoroughly. Place on ice until chilled. Pour into a glass and add charged water.

CHOCOLATE SYRUP:—This may be made in quantity, before hand. Boil together three tablespoons chocolate (melted over hot water), one cup hot water and one and one-half cups sugar, for three minutes, and one teaspoon vanilla and bottle.

The most common stimulating drinks are tea and coffee. These also may be refreshing, if properly prepared and served ice-cold. Two essentials in making tea, whether served hot or iced, are first, mind in preparing fruit drinks:—

1. Be sure to serve ice-cold and not too sweet.
2. If you are absolutely sure that the ice you use is from pure water, it may be placed in the beverage. It is better to place one large piece in a pitcher or punch bowl, as small pieces melt quickly and weaken the beverage. A small brick of water ice is most attractive in a punch bowl and serves the cooling purpose of ice.
3. If you are not sure of the ice, cool the beverage by placing the container on the ice.
4. Taste every beverage before serving, make sure it is well flavored.
5. Observe absolute cleanliness in all processes. Water is an excellent germ carrier.
6. Make the service as attractive as possible by careful choice of serving dishes and garnishes. Avoid overgarnishing.
7. Add the sugar in the form of syrup, it saves time and energy, as a quantity may be kept on hand ready for use.
8. If carbonated water is used it should be added at serving time.

ICED COFFEE:—In a coffee pot, well aired and scalded, put twice as many level tablespoons of ground coffee as there are cups to be served, add as many egg shells (washed before the eggs were broken as cups to be served or one teaspoon of egg white to each cup may be used. Add one tablespoon of cold water for each cup of liquid desired and mix thoroughly. add the required number of cups of freshly boiling water and let boil five minutes after boiling begins. Pour a little cold water down the spout, stir in one tablespoon of fresh coffee and set the pot where the liquid will simmer fifteen minutes. The quick bring-

THE name of Louise Morey Bowman is familiar to most Canadian readers, as a writer of poetry, which is more than verse. In the volume, "Moonlight and Common Day," we have the fruit of many years of work and thought. Mrs. Bowman's poetry is sometimes lightly lyrical—a veritable spring song—and sometimes psychical in its analysis of emotion and motive. There is a genuine feeling of beauty in all her work;—but there is a questing note which goes beyond the things which seem and would echo the passion of "finite hearts that yearn." This poem, "Earth Born," has a delightful blending of Pagan appreciation of all the dainty and delicate things we possess here and a belief in the "gleam of what is higher." Here is the first stanza of the poem:

"Do you think God will make us forget—
When we wake up in Heaven—
All the queer, little earth-fashioned things

That are sacred as archangel's wings
Or the stars that are seven?
Our books, our green china with posies,
My white wedding gown, with its roses,
The candles we light
In our house at night,
Your father's old clock with its wise friendly face
And my mother's old lace—
Do you think Love can ever forget?"

In her perception of the beauty of the fleeting touches of color in the haunting

"little things" which make every day memorable, Mrs. Bowman is akin to that Baltimore singer, Lizette Woodworth Reese.

In form, Mrs. Bowman follows her own fancy, sometimes choosing the well-kept classic paths, and occasionally the untracked region of free verse. However, when she turns to the latter, she does not forget that rhythm belongs to poetry, whatever may be said of rhyme. We are thankful that this Canadian writer does not follow the extreme members of the free verse tribe, in their deliberate exploiting of the sordid for its own dirty sake—as is the fashion of Mr. Edgar Lee Masters. Mrs. Bowman feels life's ironies and tragedies;—witness the poignancy of "The Little Death"—but she does not forget Aristotle's dictum that tragedy should contain the element of purification. "The Creators" is a daring plea for those whose work is different from the accepted form. The author evidently sympathizes with Browning in his sympathy with the new or half-expressed:

"But all the world's coarse thumb
And finger failed to plumb"

Mrs. Bowman is a poet from the East. Sherbrooke, Quebec, was her old home and many of her summers have been spent by the sea. There is a fresh joy in the gardens, the sea-weed, the flame which the mere city-dweller seldom knows. Here is a poem, "The Messenger," which

The dread Pyorrhea begins with bleeding gums

PYORRHEA'S infecting germs cause many ills. Medical science has proved this.

Many diseased conditions are now known often to be the result of Pyorrhea germs that breed in pockets about the teeth. Rheumatism, anaemia, nervous disorders and other diseases have been traced in many cases to this Pyorrhea infection.

Don't let Pyorrhea work its wicked will on your body. Visit your dentist frequently for teeth and gum inspection.

And watch your gums yourself. Pyorrhea, which afflicts four out of five people over forty, begins with tender and bleeding gums; then the gums recede, the teeth decay, loosen and fall out, or must be extracted to rid the system of the poisons generated at their base.

Forhan's For the Gums will prevent Pyorrhea—or check its progress—if used in time and used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices cannot do this. Forhan's keeps the gums hard and healthy—the teeth white and clean. Start using it today. If gum shrinkage has set in use Forhan's according to directions and consult a dentist immediately for special treatment.

YOU know the timeworn and yet never-too-familiar comparisons for human skin—especially that which is the complexion of a charming girl. We have such expressions as "Milk-and-roses," "peaches-and-cream" and various other references to fruit, flowers or the dairy, to find adequate description for a complexion of freshness and bloom. There are few children who have not skin of flower-like bloom and satin smoothness. It would seem, then, that Nature gives us an excellent start, so far as the skin is concerned, and that whatever all the better in complexion and constitution for a little daily lather.

However, the application of soap and water, or even of a good cleansing cream, does not seem to meet all demands of the modern treatment for preserving and refreshing the complexion. After all, we are very primitive creatures, and we find that we must go back to exceedingly simple substances in the course of our treatment of skin or nerves. There is a fable of a certain hero who regained strength every time he fell to the ground. Contact with Mother Earth has proved, again and again, of constructive influence. That is the reason why camp life is of so much benefit to worn-out nerves and tired brain.

Cherry Georgette makes the lower brim of this creation, while black and cherry esprey adorn it.

coarsening comes might be mitigated, if we were only more careful.

Of course, the matter of climate must always be taken into consideration when we are speaking of hair and complexion. Extremes of temperature are exceedingly trying, and the hair is likely to show the effect first. It is not in the far North, nor yet in the tropical regions—that you will, as a rule, find the brightest and most luxuriant tresses. The Northland, too, has a freezing effect on the face and, unless one is extremely careful, coarsens and hardens the skin until it has a positively weatherbeaten aspect. Extreme heat, it may be remarked, is even worse for the human epidermis. Central India will drain all the rose color out of English cheeks in a year or two. However, most of us are not obliged to face either extreme and may safely consider ordinary means of keeping the flesh tints bright and clear.

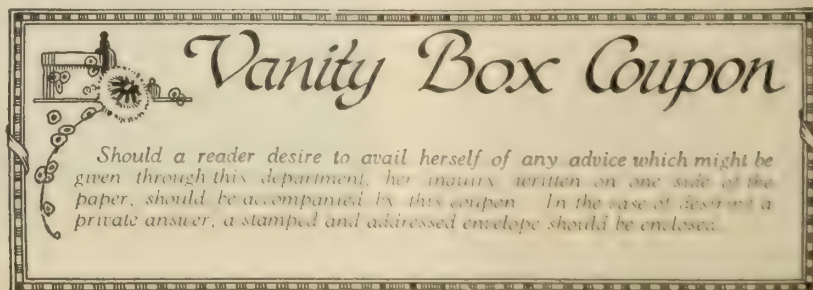

Do not use extremely cold or really hot water in washing the face. Warm water and a good soap, with a soft face brush on active service are what will be required to remove the day's soil and to keep blackheads at a respectful distance. Cold water is excellent for rinsing purposes, and rubbing the face with a small piece of ice will help to stimulate the skin. There are some—very few—who find that other cleansing agencies are better than soap—but most of us are

A graceful and beautiful gown showing the higher waist line and lovely lace sleeves.

The return to simple substances has not only a curative but an aesthetic significance. The modern workers in the laboratories which send forth beautifying preparations have been busy of late on a cleansing and reviving substance which is proving daily its efficacy in restoring softness and bloom to the skin. It forms a kind of plaster which is spread upon the skin much as you would apply the old-fashioned mustard plaster—only this preparation comes into direct con-

Mr. Arthur Stringer is a writer born in Canada, who has achieved literary fame as poet and novelist. Mr Stringer has not lost touch with Canada, for he still has his summer home at "Cedar Springs," Kent County. His latest book, "The Prairie Child," is another evidence of Mr. Stringer's determination to be "popular", and once more that aggressive heroine, "Chaddie," who was married two books ago to Duncan Argyll McKail, appears on the scene. Although the book is called "The Prairie Child," Chaddie, who is the supposed writer, dominates the narrative and the "che-ild" is secondary, while the husband is almost nowhere. Chaddie, as "The Prairie Wife," was a fairly decent citizen, rather exuberant but a good pioneer. As "The Prairie Mother," she was insufferably slangy and vulgar and wearisomely vivacious.

Perhaps it is because Mr. Stringer has done work of such fine quality that we resent this cheap series of "Chaddie" books. Surely we have done with her now and will not have her further adventures inflicted upon us! Her husband turns out to be a rather bad lot although much might be forgiven a man whose wife insists on calling him "Dinkie-dunk." There are two children, Dinkie and Popsy, (of course these are pet names)—and it is these youngsters who bring about the problematic condition. In fact, we might say that Dinkie, the boy, makes or mars the situation, for Popsy, the girl, receives comparatively scant attention. The mother lavishes an extraordinary amount of emotion on Dinkie, the beloved. We do not think so many sugar plums could have been good for the small boy; and his far-from-perfect father is right when he accuses the mother of spoiling a nice youngster and making him an over-sensitive bore.

In the advertisement of the book, the inspired propaganda which the publisher sends forth, the question is asked: "Does a woman love her husband less when children come?" In thousands of sane and wholesome Canadian households, there is no necessity for asking such a question. Chaddie, in fact, is a neurotic freak, and it is no wonder that "Dinkie-dunk," takes to drink and flirts with the unprepossessing school ma'am, who seems to love him to distraction. Duncan is decidedly common clay, but, in kindlier and steadier hands than Chaddie's, he might have been moulded into something finer than a whiskey-jug.

Chaddie, too, has her amorous by-play, although, up to the close of the narrative, it has been a strictly Platonic affair, with a Peter person as her comforter. An easy divorce seems to be the sordid solution suggested at the end of the story. Neither Duncan nor Chaddie is made of heroic stuff, and we trust the author does not intend to display the latter as a typical Canadian woman. There are beautiful and picturesque "bits" in the book, for Mr. Stringer, at his best, is a writer of dignified and melodious prose, as well as poetry, but the novel, as a complete production, is a disappointment to those who admire Mr. Stringer's early achievement. (Published in Toronto by MacMillan and Stewart).

They Fight Film—

They who have pretty teeth

Note how many pretty teeth are seen everywhere today. Millions are using a new method of teeth cleaning. They remove the dingy film. The same results will come to you if you make this ten-day test.

Why teeth are cloudy

Your teeth are coated with a viscous film. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. Film absorbs stains, then it often forms the basis of thin, dingy coats. Tartar is based on film.

Old brushing methods do not effectively combat it. So most teeth are discolored more or less.

Thus film destroys tooth beauty. It also causes most tooth troubles. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea, now so alarmingly common.

Now a daily remover

Dental science, after long research, has found two ways to combat film. Authorities have proved their efficiency. Now leading dentists, nearly all the world over, are urging their daily use.

A new-type tooth paste has been created to comply with modern requirements. These two film combatants are embodied in it. The name of that tooth paste is Pepsodent.

Its unique effects

Pepsodent, with every use, attacks the film on teeth.

It also multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That to digest the starch deposits which may cling to teeth and form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's neutralizer for the acids which cause decay.

In these three ways it fights the enemies of teeth as nothing else has done.

One week will show

Watch these effects for a few days. Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear. Enjoy the refreshing after-effects.

Do this to learn what millions know—the way to whiter, cleaner, safer teeth. Cut out the coupon now.

tact with the skin, with no intervening linen or cloth. There is nothing unpleasant or painful in the application:—quite the reverse in fact. While the clay-like covering is on the face, you experience a sensation of having dullness and impurities removed and feel as if renewed freshness were coming to the surface of the skin. You won't look at all pretty while trying this experiment. The clay has a delightful greenish-grey tint, is quite soft (almost creamy) and spreads evenly over the face. You must be careful merely to spread, not to rub it. If you wish the neck to be rejuvenated also, put a nice clay collar on it. The face should be well cleansed with warm water before you apply the clay. Dampen a small towel with decidedly warm water and hold it—closely pressed to the face for a minute or two. After the clay has thoroughly dried, leave it on for twenty minutes or more while it does its rejuvenating work. Then dampen the towel once more with warm water, press it upon the "beclayed" face and you will find that the slight mask will crumble beneath the pressure and can easily be gathered into the towel. There is really nothing at all "messy" or soiled about the treatment—and your skin feels cleaner and younger than it has for ever so long. The clay has done its cleaning work quickly and well and you feel as if the dust would not "settle" again on your countenance for hours—as if it had been drawn out by a kindly worker, just as a rug is renewed by our friend the vacuum cleaner.

There are creams, of course, to follow the clay treatment, which, in itself, is a source of invigoration. We need to realize that the skin becomes sluggish, the pores are not freely opened, and, in consequence, the complexion loses that dewy freshness of youth, which is so delightful. We do not say that any process of rejuvenation will keep the infantile softness and velvety quality of the skin, but we are quite sure that the constant use of thorough methods of cleansing and refreshing will go far towards keeping Father Time at a respectful distance. A magazine recently showed the pictures of several movie stars at various stages in their career—and it was difficult to see that they were growing older. Miss Marguerite Clarke, for instance, looks more youthful in 1922 than she did in 1910. Now, the reason for this youthful appearance is that these celebrities of the film take great care of health and looks. They realize that there is no royal road to keeping youthful:—and, therefore, they set out on an actual campaign to secure a beautiful complexion and a graceful figure. You may be sure that the ladies of the film have already become devotees of the clay treatment. It is possible to overdo the "keeping youthful" policy, but the wise woman is she who never lets the effort become obvious, but is persistent in her preservation of whatever gifts Nature has bestowed. She will be certain to avail herself of such a reasonable and satisfactory treatment as the use of the complexion clay.

THE LETTER BOX

MARION:—You are quite right in believing that diet has much to do with the coming of such "spots" as you describe. It is too bad that you have been obliged to give up strawberries, though, for there is nothing quite so satisfactory as the earliest of the berries. However, it is better to exercise a little self-control than to be uncomfortable for hours. Digestion is of tremendous importance, although we usually discover that fact when it is too late to make satisfactory repairs in the out-of-order digestion.

Most of us have too much acid in the system, and, curiously enough, imagine that sugar counteracts acid:—whereas, sugar aggravates hyperacidity. A half-teaspoonful of bicarbonate of soda in hot water, taken early in the morning will do much to settle digestive conditions for the day. Milk of magnesia is also excellent. This sounds like a dissertation on digestion, but I am sending you the names of several creams, any one of which should prove beneficial.

CARLOTTA:—Are you a really and truly Italian girl—or just a bit of Italy by name? You ought to be a brunette, you know, and, in that case, white or flesh-tinted powder should not find a place on your dressing table. I think you must be quite young, Carlotta—under twenty, at a guess—and, in that case, you would be very foolish to use more than the merest touch of powder on a very warm day. Rouge and lip-stick are not for you:—in fact, if used, at all, such things are the sad resort of the extremely mature woman and should be used very carefully, even by her. Youth is too gloriously colorful to have any need of such "restoratives."

* * *

AGNES:—Advice has been sent you regarding the curling of the hair. Perhaps you need a good tonic for only hair. It is next to impossible to keep the hair curled for any length of time (unless it has a natural "kink") in a damp climate. A solution of gum tragacanth has been declared of value by many—and it is applied before using curlers at night.

Frocks for Youthful Folks

BY CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

OF the little Lord Fauntleroy, the little Kate Greenaways, the brave little John Highland lads and lassies, La Mode has taken a long farewell. We loved them while they were with us. Now that they are gone we do not regret them. We are glad that the vain little heart of the modern juvenile, beats beneath a frock fashioned with sweet simplicity.

Bobbed hair, bobbed skirts and bobbed socks—give these, the rest is a mere matter of detail.

A small edition of her mother, her aunt or her big sister, little Miss Two-Shoes, is not burdened with superfluous undergarments. With many of her frocks she is entirely independent of petticoats, for she wears little panties just like her frock and doesn't care who knows it.

hang very straight from neck to hem with the fulness gathered in at the neck, or smocked to form rather a deep yoke. The bottom edge is scalloped or straight and buttonholed or bound, perhaps with a contrasting color. This is something after the peasant style, and for summer the sleeves are short, but for winter they are gathered into a cuff, peasant style also.

The trimming on these very childish frocks is meant to appeal to the child's developing mentality. Embroidery, cross stitch and applique are used in designs that mean something to the small wearer; blocks arranged in some simple geometrical design and outlined with colored silks, a tree or a ship, also traced in colored silks, a house or an animal in cross stitch or fruit or flowers made out of colored cloth and applied with buttonhole stitch.

Banded around her chubby knees, and showing beneath her short tunic, they announce themselves. Now that we think of it, some of the very newest are not banded at all. They are just like little straight leg trousers, buttoned on to, or attached to an underwaist.

To be really fashionable the little aristocrat of to-day cannot be too simply dressed, but her clothes must fit. A dressmaker let us into a secret the other day, which we pass along to you in strictest confidence. She said the reason many patterns do not fit the child is because there is no extra fulness in the front; that is, the back and front are the same width, and a well developed child is always plump across the breast, and must have room. Another thing she mentioned was that the shoulder seam should be almost straight and not slanting as they sometimes are on patterns. Now, we pass this along for your consideration, with the advice when changing a pattern "Be sure you are right, then go ahead."

Dresses for very small girls from two to eight or over, fit quite closely around the base of the neck and many of them have only a slit down the side fastened at the top, with a snap or tie, instead of the old way of opening them down the back or front and fastening with buttons. The slip-over-the-head idea has been adapted to children's clothes. They

This is not new, but it is just as much the mode as ever. White is very often trimmed with bright red, yellow, blue or a small checked gingham.

It will not be long before school re-opens. One more month of happy-go-lucky vacation, and then books and pencils and the daily trudge to school, or the packing of trunks for some more or less distant fountain of knowledge. In either case, the wardrobe will very likely require replenishing.

In the public schools of New England, according to a gentleman who was born and brought up there, the regulations call for wash dresses even in the winter time. They are considered more sanitary than serge or any of the woollen weaves. And it does seem reasonable. A serge dress may not show the dust and grime, but it is there just the same, whereas, every time a cotton dress comes from the laundry, it is sweet and clean, and if it is not quite warm enough for the school room, warm bloomers and a woollen sweater can be added. These can be removed at home if the temperature is higher than in school.

If it is a matter of economy, one has it in wearing the cotton dress until it is worn out instead of laying it away from one autumn till the next spring, when the small girl has in all probability outgrown it, and it has to be cast aside or let down from the waist or the hem.

Frocks for Youthful Folks

The gingham and lincns have been so prettily colored this summer that we shall hate to see them laid away for the more sober hues of navy which have served generation after generation of school girls. The ratines have also been very attractive. But, if we must, we must; and there is the ever acceptable navy blue pleated skirt, which can be bought in the stores all ready to put on and then topped off with a white wash middy or one of red or green flannel.

It is no longer considered the thing to wear a discarded frivolous frock to school. It isn't done any more. The frocks the small girl wears to school are with few exceptions very practical without being prosy-looking. They are the essence of trigness. The regulation school dress is made in one-piece sailor style with such variations as the modern designer thinks suitable for the modern school girl, and there is enough variety to avoid sameness and to let individuality have its expression. Detachable washable collars give freshness to these dark serge dresses. Organdy in flower shades and white nets, makes pretty party dresses for the very small girl, with the option of crepe Georgette and crepe de Chine.

One of the new and interesting things designers are doing on the dresses for this fall, is to have back and front panels formed by gathering or pressing the fulness into pleats. This allows enough shoulder fulness and at the same time leaves a plain and simple shoulder line.

Fine pipings in contrasting colors trim the colored or natural silk dresses, while lattice work trims others, especially the larger sizes. Pin tucks still hold an honored place in trimmings on juvenile models; also the bright colored applique in the form of fruit or flowers. Then, there is drawn work on materials which lend themselves to this form of decoration, voiles for instance which come in pastel colorings and will be worn for party dresses for early fall.

The flapper is such a wee bit of a person very often, that it almost seems as if we might consider her in the juvenile class, although she may not like it, for after all she is a very sophisticated young person. Nevertheless, she is very sweet and loveable.

It is predicted that she is going to follow her own whim in the matter of the length of her skirt. She is so sweet and pretty that she can afford to defy La Mode and wear her skirts short if she wants to, and no matter what our private opinion may be regarding the length of her skirtcoats, never before have girls had such neat looking feet and ankles—never before have they exercised such good taste in their footwear. You never see a flapper wearing a badly fitting stocking, and her shoes are always irreproachable. Extravagant you say; well, perhaps, and yet, the merchants tell us that they are not selling so much more hosiery than they used to. To be candid, if a person buys good silk hosiery and then takes care of it, she will find it just about as economical as either cashmere or cotton, for we have all become so fastidious, that we must have our hosiery made of such fine yarn, that there is not the wear in it that we used to get out of the heavier and coarser qualities.

Corsetry à la Personality

A new dawn breaks for the corseted woman—a blessed dawn because it brings to the sex the joy of being at last appropriately, comfortably and fashionably corseted.

Since our great-grandmothers stiffly "stayed" themselves in the harness of their generation, the corsetière's art has advanced none too speedily. True there have been many minor improvements in materials, workmanship and saner contour but these have been merely details and not distinct departures from the irksome "stays" of the seventeenth century. It has remained for the D & A Practical Front Corset to combine with assuredness and for Everywoman, the perfect combination of ease, style and individuality for every occasion. The D & A Practical Front Corset is actually a new and distinctively "different" dress invention. It is alone in many respects but chiefly in that it is the corset which without effort enables the wearer to acquire a fresh, easy and perfect fitting every time she puts it on. It is not merely a step ahead of the ordinary corset. It actually creates a new era in the art of corsetry.

In the Days of Irsome Stays

Custom-Fitted Daily

In the D & A Practical Front Corset a woman is virtually refitted every day—recorseted with all the precision and individuality that the most expert custom-corsetière could afford. The features which thus set apart the D & A Practical Front Corset from all the rest are basic, exclusive and inimitable because protected by patent against imitation.

First among these extraordinary features is an inner vest of pliable elastic webbing which clasps and remains vertical and true at the exact center of the body. Thus even before the corset is laced it is settled that it shall not twist or ride up throughout the most strenuous service.

A New Era in Corsetry

Most corsets remain in the original lacing position from the morn of purchase to the eve of service. The lacing thus bears remorselessly on the same points and the shape of the corset is soon ruined. But what a joy to lace the outer flap over the inner vest of the D & A Practical Front Corset.

It is done in a jiffy shoe-wise over flat hooks (no eyelets) especially designed to engage the lacing against slippage. The lacing "takes up" on the elastic vest beneath and draws the corset to the hairline of fit and comfort for the particular figure and occasion. A complete refitting, a recurrent rebirth of the corset's original, precise and correct beauty for every type and every individual figure.

To see a D & A Practical Front Corset is to be at once curious and impressed. To try it on is to marvel. To wear it is to be corset satisfied to the uttermost.

The prices of the D & A Practical Front Corset are moderately placed at five dollars and upwards to twelve. At most good stores or departments where corsets are sold you may select your appropriate model.

Upon request the makers will mail you a Descriptive Style Book used matters not at all: the chief consideration being, rather, a convenient and pleasant relationship to the other rooms of the house.

Being, however, formal in their intent both a music room and a reception room call for a pronounced formality of treatment. There should be, then, a restrained use of any purely decorative objects in the rooms and an equal reserve in the employment of unessential furniture. Formality, too, can be suggested through the selection of somewhat cold and receding color-schemes, to the exclusion of those warmer hues that always appear to reflect welcome. In one successful little reception room which has been recently equipped, selection of a receding, light, greenish-blue coloring for the painted ceiling, walls and woodwork. The long, straight window-hangings are of the same blue in a slightly darker shade and the patternless rugs of a blue that is almost navy. The mahogany furniture is upholstered in a dark blue velour, that has an undertone of gold. This enriching glint of gold is especially effective, because it repeats the hue of the tall, gilt harp, which stands in one corner of the room. Gold gauze, mounted over yellow silk, shades the dull brass lighting fixtures and an antique, gilt-framed mirror brightens one wall. Simple, harmonious, dignified and formal in its treatment, this little room cannot but grey is the foundation of a scheme that very aptly illustrates the formality inherent in certain colorings. The walls are hung with a silvery-grey grasscloth and the woodwork is enameled grey. For the floor-covering, an unpatterned carpet of much darker grey velvet is used. The glass-curtains are of silver gauze and the long inner window-hangings of blue-and-green changeable taffeta. The furniture—of which there is but little—is finished in a dull black paint, with narrow lines of peacock-blue as the sole decoration. Appropriately, the chair cushions are of peacock-blue velvet, with cords and tassels of dull silver. And, very subtly, a pleasant relief has been imparted by the glowing orange lining of the silver gauze shades used on the lighting fixtures of silver finish.

In this sun-flooded breakfast room, the wallpaper is of ivory-color closely dotted in pale yellow. The standing woodwork is enameled ivory-white and the floor is painted a dark olive-green, which forms an excellent background for the quaint hooked rugs in cheerful colorings. The simple sideboard, after the lines of a Welsh dresser, is finished in a soft yellow-green; but the balance of the furniture is painted a light parchment-yellow and stippled. The long table-runner is of old-fashioned glazed English chintz, showing yellows, greens and pinks against an ivory ground. Dotted Swiss tie-back curtains are especially suitable here—and the row of little potted geraniums is a subtle bit of artistry!

In an attractive though diminutive music room, spaciousness and formality of effect are both attained through the admirably fulfill the purpose for which it was created.

Frequently, a neglected attic holds possibilities that its owners do not dream of for the achievement of delightful little extra rooms. Does a den, tucked cozily away beneath the roof and offering sanctuary from the hum of family life not sound inviting? Whether an attic den be large or small, it can be picturesque and altogether distinctive. If, for instance, the roofing timbers be frankly exposed and suitably finished, they will impart an original and decorative effect to the whole room. The rugged character of the timbered ceiling will, naturally, suggest the use of very sturdy furniture and substantial accessories. Then, if a fireplace be added for good cheer, its development should, of course, respond to the general virility both in design and materials: and, if a room be small in

Music at the National Exhibition

Organized Effort to be Made that it May Serve a Genuinely Propagandist Purpose

BY HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

MUSIC has always been something of a factor at the Canadian National Exhibition but until quite recently there has been no co-ordinated effort. The present year will mark the beginning of a new era in the history of the greatest of annual fairs, for President John G. Kent has announced that hereafter Music Day is as it were to be one of the "ember days" of the institution. For years past we have had Stock-Breeders Day, Manufacturers Day, Educationists Day, Labor Day, American Visitors Day, and so on. At last Music is to have specific recognition of a similar character.

This is a sign of the times; for it is abundantly clear that the art is taken much more seriously as a factor in Canadian social life than it once was. Of course, musical exhibits have always played a very considerable part in the displays of manufactured articles; but I can remember a time when the piano exhibitors were regarded by the general public as a nuisance. They used to hire must become a part of the Exhibition's permanent and official activities.

Owing to the erection of new structures, the President and Directors have found themselves able to place at the disposal of the Canadian Bureau for the Advancement of Music, which has now taken charge of the competitions, the former Dairy Building which has a special advantage in that it contains an amphitheatre, originally constructed as an auditorium for lectures on scientific dairying, and is an ideal place for musical trials. The Bureau in question is "an association of those interested in the general musical advancement of Canada through the development of music in the home, church and school." Its Honorary President is Mr. H. A. Fricker, Conductor of the Mendelssohn Choir, and the one who gives urge to many of its artistic plans is Dr. A. S. Vogt, Managing Director of the Toronto Conservatory of Music. It embraces in its membership, not only the commercial leaders of the music trades of Canada, but many of piano pounders to demonstrate which instrument could make the most noise and the competitive efforts produced a terrible cacophony.

Finally it was found necessary to put them out of the old Manufacturers Building and give them an annex all to themselves. This musical annex used to be visited for purposes of amusement by those who could stand the din; but few remained for more than five minutes. The levity of the music trades in their attitude towards the art of music was characteristic of the public sentiment of the time. But presently the commercial firms identified with music awoke to the fact that in their own interests they should try to make music charming and sympathetic, rather than ridiculous, and a gradual improvement ensued. Much of the improvement in the trade attitude toward music has been due to the entry into the field of the revolutionary mechanical devices—the player-piano and the phonograph. Those engaged in the marketing of these devices realized that the surest way to build up a demand for these instruments was to interest the public at large in good music and create an appetite for it. To-day we find the music trades eagerly supporting any idea for the encouragement of music whether it promises a direct profit or not—certain that anything which tends to diffuse musical appetite must in the long run bring benefits to them.

Two or three years ago the exhibitors interested in the phonographic devices undertook the step of conducting musical competitions for solo voices. It meant nothing to them in the selling of machines and records, but it served to place them before the public as men eager to do something for music as an art, and they had the co-operation of some of the most eminent Canadian musicians and adjudicators. The idea took so well that last year it got quite out of hand. The accommodations provided for the contests became quite inadequate for the crowds which wished to hear the trials and it became clear that the competitions the leading musicians and teachers as well. It has an active Secretary-Treasurer in Captain J. S. Atkinson; and for those readers who may be interested in keeping in touch with the Bureau's activities it may be said that his offices are in the Ryrie Building, 229 Yonge Street, Toronto.

Prizes

Gold, Silver and Bronze Medals shall be awarded to the prize winners in each class and a scholarship of $100.00 to the outstanding contestant in each Department, that is, one Vocal, one Piano and one Violin scholarship.

The committee chosen from musicians on the staffs of the adjudicating institutions has drawn up certain regulations which are deemed necessary to facilitate their completion in the limited time that must elapse between the opening of the exhibition on August 26th and the completion of the judging, which ends during the second week. It reserves the right to disqualify any competitor ing to a boil gives the bright fresh flavor, the long simmering gives the mellowness. After fifteen minutes pour from the grounds directly into the glasses filled with cracked ice, or it may be poured from the grounds and left in the ice chest until thoroughly chilled, before serving.

SUGAR SYRUP:—One cup of sugar and one cup of water. Put ingredients in a sauce pan, stir until sugar is dissolved and boil gently without stirring from five to eight minutes. Pour into a glass jar, set aside and use when wanted. This is much better than sugar for sweetening every-day lemonade and orangeade and is used in many fruit punches and fruit cocktails. Larger amounts may be made at one time if the syrup is used frequently.

FRUIT PUNCH:—One-quarter cup of lemon juice, one-half cup of orange juice, one-half cup of sugar syrup, one cup of pineapple syrup, two cups of ice water. Mix ingredients and strain over ice. Garnish each glass with a sprig of mint or a thin slice of pineapple.

strength of the fruit juices gives the rich penetrating flavor that makes fruit juice cocktails really snappy and stimulating. Owing to their strength only a small portion should be served. They should be tart rather than sweet, always icy cold and served as daintily as possible.

GRAPEFRUIT COCKTAIL:—Five tablespoons grapefruit juice, two tablespoons orange juice, one tablespoon lemon juice, three tablespoons sugar syrup, a few grains of salt, one-half cup of charged water (optional), four sprigs of mint, crushed ice. Mix all the ingredients, except the mint and ice, thoroughly. Put crushed ice in glasses, put in mixture, garnish with mint. Serve at once.

STRAWBERRY COCKTAIL:—One-quarter cup of grapefruit juice, one-quarter cup of fresh strawberry juice, one tablespoon lemon juice, three tablespoons of sugar syrup, crushed ice. Prepare and serve as grapefruit cocktail.

MINT COCKTAIL:—Two tablespoons

Mint Cup

CARDINAL PUNCH:—One pint of cranberries, one pint of water, one-half cup of orange juice, one and one-half tablespoons of lemon juice, one cup of sugar syrup, one pint of soda or appollinaris water, or one pint ice water. Cook cranberries and water until the fruit is very soft and then strain through a double thickness of cheesecloth. When cool add the fruit juices, syrup and water and pour into glasses filled with chopped ice.

FRUIT PUNCH FOR FIFTY:—One cup of sugar syrup, one cup of tea infusion, two cups of strawberry syrup, juice of five lemons, juice of five oranges, one can of grated pineapple, one cup of cherries, one quart of charged water. Mix the sugar, tea and fruit juices and let stand thirty minutes, strain, add ice water to make one and one-half gallons of liquid. Add cherries and charged water. In a punch bowl, place a brick of water ice any flavor desired, (color may match a table color scheme), pour over this the liquid.

A glass of fruit juice just before a meal is most refreshing and appetizing, and fruit juice cocktails are often served as the first course of an informal luncheon or dinner; they may also be served at afternoon tea or on the piazza. The full of chopped mint leaves, three tablespoons of sugar syrup, two tablespoons of lemon juice, one tablespoon of orange juice, green color paste, one-half cup of charged water. Put mint leaves in sugar syrup and let stand one half hour or longer. Add fruit juices and enough color paste to make a delicate shade of green. Dilute with charged water, mix thoroughly and serve in glasses with crushed ice.

Fruit cocktails or fruit cups in which there are pieces of fruit with the fruit juices are served as a first course or as a dessert at a simple luncheon or dinner.

RED CROSS COCKTAIL:—Arrange in glasses white cherries, cubes of pineapple, and sections of grapefruit. Pour over a dressing made by mixing for each cocktail, two tablespoons of Maraschino syrup, one tablespoon each of pineapple juice, cherry juice and lemon juice. Garnish with pieces of Maraschino cherry arranged in form of a cross.

FRUIT CUP:—One cup of white grapes, one cup of orange sections, one cup of diced pineapple, one-half cup of orange juice, one-half cup of pineapple juice. Remove skins and seeds from grapes and membrane from oranges. Thoroughly mix the fruit, arrange in glasses and garnish with Maraschino cherries.

DUNLOP

CORD TIRES FABRIC

Dunlop Tires are retailed by a standard printed list, which you can obtain from any garage or tire dealer. Our 28 years in business is worth something as a guide to every motorist — twenty-eight years of continually making good, not only in the sense of manufacturing but in the sense of assuming responsibility for what we manufacture.

Then, dwell on this fact: Never before in the whole history of tire-making have reliable tire manufacturers been giving such a big dollar's worth to the motorist. Mileage on Dunlop Tires is not only the greatest in all our years of tire-making, but prices have been dropping bit by bit until to-day you have figures lower than any which could be offered during the past ten years. "NEVER ON A BIGGER SCALE"

Those Little Extra Rooms

area, its fireplace should, naturally, be scaled accordingly.

It is, indeed, very important to pay attention to this matter of scale in decorating and furnishing any small room. A wallpaper of flamboyant pattern and gaudy coloring tends to diminish the apparent size of even a large room: conspicuous designs of decided color either in rugs, window-hangings or chair-coverings exert—though, perhaps, in slightly less degree—much the same influence. Prominently-figured furnishings have, therefore, no legitimate place in the very small room.

Whether they be finished in plaster, paint or paper, plain walls are ideal. For certain rooms, especially those intended for a man's use, the rough, "sand-float" plaster finish is interesting and appropriate, because it suggests virility. The natural gray-white coloring of the plaster is perfectly adapted to a sunny room: but, in a room that receives but little direct sunlight, a fairly warm tint—putty, perhaps, ecru or old ivory—is preferable. There are, too, some delightful wallpapers that give much the same effect, owing to their textured weave. Not only the rough plaster but such varied fabrics and materials as granite, burlap, grasscloth, chambray and dimity are most faithfully reproduced in wallpaper to-day. Any of these can be successfully employed in the smallest room. Very small dots and hair-line stripes are also sufficiently inconspicuous to conform to the scale of a little room.

with the furniture. Window-hangings of changeable sunfast material in grey-and-orange, a dark grey rug, bordered in orange and dull blue, and several orange-shaded reading lights combine to pleasantly offset any suggestion of sombreness in the room. Unfortunately, dark paneling does rather tend towards a certain gloominess of effect: hence its use should be confined, as a general rule, to rooms of very cheerful exposure—and, even there, colorful accessories should be freely introduced. It is also extremely desirable to have the hue of the paneling exactly match the color of the furniture that is to predominate in the room.

Plain effects in the floor-covering of a small room are as commendable as simplicity in the treatment of the walls. With the present interest in the Mid-Victorian Period, the revived use of the all-over carpet is quite natural—and, to a very small room, this revival can be agreeably applied. With an unpatterned carpet to cover the entire floor, small rugs placed before any much-used furniture will provide interesting spots of contrasting color. Several small rugs or one larger rug can, however, be appropriately used. For these, the plain centre bordered in a darker shade is invariably a safe selection. A rug of more pronounced

In this sunlit, little morning room, simplicity reigns supreme. The walls are covered with a paper that carries hair-line stripes of gray against a lighter gray background. To conform with the Colonial spirit of the architectural design, the standing woodwork is enameled ivory-white. The gray ground of the one large rug is patterned in old blue and mulberry and the windows are hung with straight curtains of ivory-white scrim.

character is, nevertheless, not unsuitable when the other furnishings within the room are devoid of pattern: and, sometimes, a rug of distinctive type is so effectively used, that it confers charm upon an entire room. An exquisite Chinese rug in lovely blendings of faded rose, blue and yellow fairly radiates distinction in one little reception room that is furnished in old, rose-upholstered walnut. Soft dull rose curtains are hung at the windows and the paneled walls are painted a creamy tone that holds a tinge of delicate flesh-color. There is not a picture in the room—there is not a touch of applied ornamentation to divert attention from the marvellous beauty of the rug!

Floor-coverings should reflect the character of the rooms in which they are used. The Chinese rug, delightful as it is in a formal reception room, could scarcely be reconciled to an informal little sewing room or breakfast room. In these, as in a dressing room, a boudoir or a morning room, rag rugs are ever-attractive—simply because the homelike rag rug is typical of informality. By the same token, a Navajo blanket, although its use as a floor-covering in library, den or PAINTED walls are especially attractive when their color is keyed to that of the standing woodwork of the room. If the walls are in good condition, the paint can, of course, be applied to the plaster: otherwise, the most satisfactory plan is to cover the walls with a fine canvas, which provides an excellent painting surface. In either case, the paneling of the walls by means of narrow wood mouldings is entirely practicable. Paneling, is, however, always a badge of formality: hence it is not suited to a small room of informal use. It should, rather, be reserved for the little room that is to serve as music room, library or reception room.

Paneling developed entirely in dark-stained wood is occasionally used with good results in a library, writing room or den. In one little den, which is furnished in brownish-gray oak, the walls are paneled with oak stained to correspond who is not ready to compete within five minutes after being called. The adjudicators will use their own judgment as to the candidates selected from each class of contestants for the final tests. The prizes will be awarded immediately on the close of the Competition, and protests must be made in writing direct to the Secretary during the Competition. To ensure fairness Competitors will be designated to the adjudicators by number only. The entries close on August 1st, and contestants are to be duly notified as to the day on which they will be heard.

A very important point is that all selections must be memorized. The singer or instrumentalist who appears with music, as has been customary in past competitions, is thus automatically disqualified. The test pieces selected by the judges are as follows:

Of course the ultimate aim of those who have taken the matter in hand is to secure the erection on the grounds of the Canadian National Exhibition of a permanent Temple of Music with provision for organ recitals, orchestral concerts, choral competitions and other events that will make music at the great fair a matter of the highest critical and public importance. They feel greatly encouraged by the establishment of Music Day, as a step in this direction, and efforts are already under way, entirely apart from the competitions mentioned, to bring home to every visitor on that day at least, the significance of the art. On Music Day it is proposed to give a picturesque aspect to the occasion by sending through the grounds from morning to evening bands of singing troubadours in costume who will render selections in various buildings at different times. There is to be music everywhere, and in buildings where ordinarily it is not heard at all. The Manufacturers Building is so large that it will be possible to put on four distinctive programmes continuously in the different corners of that edifice. On that day the amphitheatre of the Dairy Building will be taken over by the phonograph dealers who will put on six forty-five minute concerts beginning at two p.m.—the hall to be cleared at fifteen minutes of the hour in order to admit a new audience. There will also be community singing and other events suitable to the day in front of the grand stand.

In addition to the competitions of the Bureau for the Advancement of Music, above outlined, the Board of the Canadian National Exhibition has revived the old custom of holding band competitions, open to the whole country. This is divided into two classes, bands of forty and bands of twenty-five. Cash prizes of large dimensions are to be awarded and this feature should prove a great future stimulus to the revival of many rural bands that have fallen into decay. Thirty years or more ago the smaller centres of Ontario boasted many bands of fine quality but of late years they have largely disappeared. Any step, however small, which may help to stimulate their revival is a step in the right direction.

Good band music has always been a feature of the National Exhibition since the days when it inaugurated the practice of bringing the famous Guards Bands of the Household Brigade from London, England. This year it has not been found feasible to bring one of these superb military bands across the ocean. But an even more interesting step has been taken. A renowned band from the West Indies, which is said to play with rare beauty of tone and expression is coming and will help to stimulate interest in a part of the Western Hemisphere whose relations with Canada are gradually becoming closer. Some readers may not be aware that the finest local band in North America is located on Canadian soil at the town of Huntsville in the northern Muskoka district. This is the Anglo-Canadian Leather Company's Band, financed by President Shaw of that corporation, to enliven the social life of the town—largely populated by his own employees—and to spread musical culture among the settlers of the Huntsville district. This particular band happens to possess a world famous conductor in Herbert Clarke, a Canadian by birth, long chief cornetist and assistant conductor for John Philip Sousa and a renowned soloist and composer for brass instruments. During the past two or three years the Huntsville Band has been a feature of the National Exhibition and it amazes American visitors to learn that it hails from a part of Canada that a few years ago was regarded as a wilderness. This band is indeed one of Canada's finest exhibits from every point of view.

Institutions like the Canadian National Exhibition must be representative in the fullest sense of the word to maintain their position. They cannot advance much beyond the taste and abilities of the people as a whole. The fact that Music has become so real a factor in its activities is symptomatic of the widening interest in the art which developed in Canada during recent years. Music lovers are naturally glad to see this awakening, it lies within the power of the Exhibition to give music a form of advertising and propagandist appeal that is beyond writers and lecturers. This year every visitor to the Exhibition will have it borne in on him that music is now on Canada's intellectual map; and it is felt that this is but a prelude of bigger things to come.

billiard room be altogether commendable, could never meet the decorative requirements of a room intended solely for formal service.

Simplicity should be the keynote in the window-treatment of a small room. That is really an excellent rule: for, in order to definitely suggest the character and the utilization of any room, it is but essential to differentiate in the choice of materials. Thus, while maintaining simplicity of line, the window-hangings of a formal room can typify formality by their richness of material; whereas, in the very informal room, the materials can be as simple as the actual method of curtaining.

been engaged on the production for several months, have planned a spectacle which has the pomp and lavish display of the Orient, with the warmth and mystery of the desert. This should prove one of the most picturesque and memorable spectacles which visitors to the Exhibition have seen.

There are special "days" at the C.N.E., with Labor Day usually leading in numbers attending. Children's Day is one of the merriest, with happy, healthy youngsters everywhere, and all the balloons in brilliant evidence:—a day to drive the Old Woman Who Lived In A Shoe clean crazy. There is an American Day for our visitors from the neighboring Republic, on which the C.N.E. proves itself a maker of international goodwill, for there are many thousands who return to New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois and other great States, to tell of Canada's annual fair. There is Women's Day, which tells the tale of how woman has risen steadily to a seat in the Canadian House of Commons. There is also a Press Day when the Fourth Estate is in power and tells what a benefit the pen has been to the country and the Great Fair.

During July, 1914, posters went forth with the announcement, "Peace Exhibition," for that summer marked the centenary of the Peace of Ghent which closed the War of 1812. For one hundred years, John Bull and Uncle Sam had been jolly good friends—and it was well to mark the anniversary. Before the date for the Exhibition opening in August, the heaviest war cloud the modern world has seen had gathered in Europe and was already darkening the sky of Canada. Nevertheless the Exhibition was held—and in every year of the strife it continued to be part of the silver lining of the cloud, showing how industrial Canada was carrying on. During the winter in the war years, the exhibition grounds became a camp in khaki, as many as ten thousand men being in training at a time. The words "Canadian National Exhibition" remained above the entrance gates, bearing a new significance as one realized the stern nature of the training which the show grounds witnessed every day.

Again the Exhibition Park means only the display of peace and prosperity. The sacrifice of the war years is not forgotten, but Canada realizes that her future is to be one of continent-wide activity if the Dominion is to prove worthy of her sons. In the display of the Canadian National Exhibition of 1922 are gathered such products as Tennyson described long ago:

Harvest-tool and husbandry,
Loom and wheel and engine,
Secrets of the sullen mine,
Steel and gold, and corn and wine,
Fabric rough or farty-fine,
Sunny tokens of the Line,
Polar marvels, and a feast
Of wonder, out of West and East.

There really was a Buried Treasure

More valuable than the gold of Captain Kidd.

More wonderful than the jewels of Blackbeard.

More shrewdly hidden than the treasure chest of either of them.

Wrapped in the interior of the kernel of white corn was a "taste" with a charm which food flavors seldom have. Good Mother Nature carefully tucked away this rare and delightful "taste," full of richness and delicacy of flavor, so that man might discover it for himself if he were willing to make the effort.

It took much hunting and skill to locate this treasure and perfect it for use.

It has been done in Post Toasties.

These deliciously crisp flakes of golden-brown have the full flavor from the selected hearts of corn — seasoned and processed and toasted just right — and then triply sealed to preserve the oven-freshness for you.

Post Toasties are called Post Toasties and not just "corn flakes" because they are a particular and better kind of corn flakes — though usually they cost no more than other kinds.

A bowl of Post Toasties for breakfast or lunch is a feast of appetite joy.

Ask any grocer for Post Toasties, and you will be well paid for specifying these corn flakes by name. The Yellow and Red package is the Post Toasties package.

Canning by the Cold-Pack Method

BY FRANCES M. McNALLY

THE canning of fruits and vegetables not only saves but insures a more healthy diet for the family. The fibre, mineral salts, acids and vitamins, in fruits and vegetables, are a daily requirement of the body, if health is to be maintained. Nutrition specialists tell us that home canning should be so planned that the family will have a jar of fruit and a jar of vegetables every day, when fresh supplies cannot be obtained. Scientific methods have simplified and shortened the process of canning so that it need no longer be the hot, arduous task that it was ten years ago. The cold pack method is easily learned by anyone who will follow directions carefully, and the necessary utensils are already on hand in most homes.

Equipment:—

The question most frequently asked regarding equipment is "What kind of jar is best?" This is entirely a matter of individual preference. The screw top, the glass top with wire bails and the vacuum top may all be used successfully. Jars with wide necks and straight sides are easily packed and cleaned. Every jar before being packed should be examined carefully for defects. Run the finger around the edge to see if the glass is chipped, also fill the jar with water; if tiny air bubbles rise from the side of the jar, there is a defect in the glass and the jar must be discarded. Examine the caps of screw top jars to see if they are and a time piece. Plenty of fresh, clean water, both hot and cold is essential.

Procedure: There are six distinct steps in procedure: Preparation of materials, blanching, the cold-dip, Packing, Sterilizing and Sealing.

Preparation of materials: Take the product directly from the garden, field or orchard if possible. No vegetables or fruits which are withered should be used. Clean the product as you would for immediate use, that is wash, remove skins, pits, cores, seeds, etc., cut in halves, quarters or cubes or can whole, as you may wish to have the product when it is to be used.

Blanching or scalding: To scald means to immerse the product in boiling water long enough to loosen the skin. To blanch means to immerse the product in boiling water long enough to reduce the bulk, to start the flow of coloring matter and to eliminate objectionable flavors. The time for blanching varies with different fruits and vegetables. Some fruits, (peaches tomatoes) require only scalding, and in canning berries and all soft fruits, blanching is dispensed with entirely. Greens and green vegetables such as spinach and asparagus should be blanched over live steam, for when blanched in water much of their valuable and special food value is wasted. Make a hammock of cheese cloth and tie the ends in the handles or the sides of the boiler. Place a little water in the boiler and when it has bent or the rim is imperfect. Adjust the rubber, screw on the top tightly and invert to test for leakage. All jars must be fitted with good rubbers. The importance of good rubber rings cannot be over emphasized; the possibility of keeping the jar air tight depends on the rubber used. Never buy cheap rubbers, and never use the same rubber more than once. Use the rubbers which come with the jars only for pickles and preserves which keep without an air tight seal.

The sterilizing vessel may be a flat bottomed kettle, a wash boiler, or any container deep enough to hold the jars set in a vertical position, with sufficient room below for water to circulate underneath the jars and enough room above so that the jars may be covered by at least an inch of boiling water. The size of the vessel otherwise is governed by the number of jars to be sterilized each time. There must be a rack or false bottom for the sterilizing vessel. This may be any kind of frame work that will hold the jars at least one half inch above the bottom of the kettle. This is necessary to permit free circulation of water under the jars and to prevent them from coming in contact with the heated bottom of the kettle. A piece of stiff wire netting cut to fit the container with edges beaten down or a rack made by fastening some wire netting to two small cross pieces of wood does very well.

Other items of equipment necessary are: a blanching vessel into which the product is lowered for scalding or blanching, a cold-dip vessel, a wire basket or piece of cheesecloth, several large bowls, paring knives, spoons, colander, a jar lifter, scales reached the boiling point, put the greens in the suspended cheese cloth, put on the cover of the boiler and steam the required time. For all other products requiring blanching, have a kettle of boiling water ready. Place product in a wire basket or cheesecloth, lower into boiling water. Remove promptly as indicated by time table for blanching. It is important to count the time for blanching from the minute the water begins to boil after the product is immersed.

Cold Dip: Lower the product from the hot water immediately into the cold water. This helps to loosen the skin, to set the coloring matter, to make firm the texture and to cool the product so that it is easier to handle.

Packing: The material is now ready to go into jars. Jars, lids and rubbers should be sterilized for all products that require less than twenty minutes cooking. For other products careful washing and scalding is sufficient. Pack products carefully so as to have a well filled jar, attractive in appearance when completed. Complete the filling of the jar by adding, to vegetables, hot water and salt for seasoning—one teaspoon to a quart; to fruit, hot syrup. Put on a new rubber, see that it lies flat and fits well. Adjust the top and put top spring in place but leave the side spring up. If the jar is screw top, screw loosely. Jars should not be completely sealed.

Sterilizing or Processing: Place jars on wire rack in the sterilizing vessel. Have water about the same temperature dark groves and snow-capped mountains. We were flying fast, fast! But having taken wing, we could do no more loitering. The rush of wind, on the face gave the only sense of speed, but now and then an air hole caught us, made us slightly sink, and rise again with a sound as of a mallet thumping against the planes.

The Idol of Youth

Patchinka being a wise pilot, climbed to a great height so that, if "pearl trouble" repeated, the slow, descending glide from a high altitude might bring us as far as Algiers itself. Nothing happened, however; and as the sky darkened like velvet behind the tinsel of stars, lights far below us advertised Algiers.

Once above that spangled patch we were comparatively safe, for now we had land to descend upon, if need be. We had now only to think of our journey's end, and what awaited us—at Hamada. That we did think of, silently, as we sat side by side. But if Dupont and Mendez had a surprise to spring upon us, we also had a surprise in store for them.

Studying maps and time-tables at Monte Carlo I'd learned that from Algiers to Biskra is an all-night journey by train. Beyond, it had not been easy to calculate, as I could get no time-table of the new desert railway between Biskra and Tougourt. But what a train takes hours to do an aeroplane can accomplish in a few flashing moments.

Streaming southward above Algiers (flying lower now) through the blue dusk we could make some features of the landscape. Dark patches meant orange groves, olives, or date palms, with here and there a town like a medallion of jewels. There rose wild, jagged mountains with star-sheen on their gnashing teeth; and after those came golden waves of desert. Biskra we recognized by the aid of compass and illuminated map, and shortly after Patchinka began a gradual glide down.

Suddenly, without looking round, we were conscious of a brilliant white light in the cabin behind us. I turned my head and saw Dupont on his feet. He had smashed a pane in one of the side windows and thrust out his arm, a huge electric torch in his hand.

"He's signalling," I said. "That settles it. We'll give it to them for all they're worth, and then a bit. Just stunt till they're blotto!"

The Lady from the Air needed no explanation. She and I had settled between us that, if the enemy tried tricks on us, we'd try stunts on them. Now was the moment! Without a word Patchinka shut off the engine, pulled the stick straight back, and put on full rudder, first left, then right. We spun like a top, reversed and spun back. Petro made no sound, but from within the cabin issued shouts and shrieks, male and female. There were loud taps on the glass, but we paid no attention. When she was ready for something new, Patchinka eased the stick forward and took off the rudder. We came out of our spin and into a straight dive. Then the pilot began rolling and half-rolling, a spectacular stunt which she and I had practised together. Gauthier had finished with me, at Nice.

Over onto its back went the biplane, and continued turning until it was on an even keel again. Once more we dived, and emerged from the manoeuvre facing in the opposite direction from that in which we'd started.

To those in the cabin the pilot must have seemed mad, or else the machine gone berserk. But Patchinka's skill avoided any sudden strain, and we laughed as we pictured the state of mind—still more the state of stomach—of the Syndicate. As for Wendela—well, she was in no danger. And we hadn't invited her to come!

Next, Patchinka gave the passengers a side-stall, pulling the Mascot's nose up vertically with the engine shut off, and just before all flying speed was lost putting on full rudder, so that we fell on one wing into a deep dive. Finishing this trick with Patchinka's conception of an Immelmann turn, we did a vertical bank, looped the loop twice, and melted gracefully into a "falling leaf" just high enough above ground to get a good dive and start the propeller revolving again.

Below us by this time were a few lights which must mean Hamada. Close by was a curious effect as of a lake, but we knew from the map that there was nothing of the kind within a hundred miles. The gleam and glisten was only saltpetre, white and ghost-like in the surrounding gold of rippling dunes; and as Patchinka used those mystic "night eyes" of hers in making a descent, I looked to our defences. Such as they were, I had them concealed about my person. All but the gift which our good Duke of Wellington had pressed upon Patchinka. That was on her person.

We alighted on sand as on rolls of velvet, taxied along over almost level desert, and before we had stopped out of the cabin stumbled the Syndicate—the Syndicate, sick as any dog except Petro who was never sick.

"You are murderers!" choked Mendez. "If we live, it is no thanks to you. You are devils!"

As for Dupont, he was speechless. If he'd ever been a figure of romance for Wendela he was far from it now as any pea-green, seasick man can be. Not that it mattered to her. She was in no mood to criticise. She could only gasp and moan: "Oh, let me down. I want to die. I'll never fly again. I'd sooner stay here in this nasty sand the rest of my life!"

I was sorry for the girl, though she deserved what she got. But all we did was done with a purpose. If Mendez and Dupont had laid a trap for us, they were so sick now that someone else must spring it.

Only Mendez and Dupont hurled themselves to earth. They were in desperate haste to land for some reason physical or moral. But despite her outcry Wendela made no motion to alight. She remained in the open cabin, either too weak to move or else resolved to follow our example at any price.

It was part of my plan that Patchinka and I should stop where we were till we'd taken our bearings; and still in our seats, side by side, we gazed round us through the dusk.

Under the stars we could see each golden ripple of sand, like the wrinkling of waves stirred by wind. We could see the glint of the saltpetre tract, like a mother-o'-pearl shell dropped in the desert; and we could see something else; a distant black tent, like pictures I remembered of Bedouin tents, with a lantern before it.

This tent was pitched about a hundred yards from the spot where we had descended. It appeared to be alone, and though from a height we'd seen lights which we supposed to be Hamada, as we dropped we had lost the vision. We seemed far from all signs of desert life—except for that large, low black tent with the lantern in front of it.

Suddenly, though we saw no one leave the tent, we were conscious of two figures running towards us from its direction, figures of men silhouetted black against the shimmer of sand.

As we looked a light shot out, streaming straight to our eyes. One of the men had a big electric torch like that used for signalling by Dupont. Behind it he and his comrade were veiled in darkness, but the white ray focussed first on Mendez and Dupont, next on Patchinka and me. Next came a shot which got me in the left arm. My leather coat was wool-lined and saved me a bit. If I'd never been hit before, I should have thought it no more than a blow from a pebble.

Wendela screamed. Patchinka made no sound, but threw herself before me. I whirled her away, and put her behind my back. "Lie down," I said; but she stood up tall and slim.

"Cowards!" she cried out shrilly. "Cowards!"

And then I saw (as the blinding ray shut off for a second) that the two men running towards us were Moroni, and Gauthier of Nice.

CHAPTER XLIII

Stand or Fall.

GAUTHIER and Moroni! For an instant I thought myself deceived by some optical illusion. But in a flash I realized why I ought all along to have known these men would be at Hamada.

I'd paid too small attention to Moroni's disappearance, attributing it to cowardice—a wish to avoid the Mascot flight! As for Gauthier I'd almost forgotten him of late; his dislike of me, his thwarted love for Patchinka. Why, of course, he would be here, lending active aid to any plot! How easy for Borisoff's partner to annex secretly a few gallons of stored petrol, and—bribed to fly with Moroni—meet us at Hamada!

"Where are your Arabs?" bawled Mendez.

"Your fault—you promised to be here before sunset!" flung back Gauthier. "The fools are in the village—religious festival—fire—dancing. But they'll have heard the plane, and my shot. They'll be here to earn their pay. Meanwhile there are four of us to deal with one damned spoilsport. Hands up, Malet, or I fire again. No fear, ladies—you are safe. But out of our way, please!"

The two were close on us now. Yet I did not hold up my hands, nor did the girls get out of the way.

It went without saying that Patchinka wouldn't. It was only Wendela's behaviour which gave me a surprise. Patchinka stood full in front of me now, because, having pulled a Mills bomb from the right and left pockets of my coat I could no longer use physical strength to force her obedience. She knew (though she hadn't seen) just how my hands were occupied, for we had mapped out our programme of defence in case of some such episode. She knew also, of course, that whatever Gauthier's intentions might be, killing or wounding her wasn't among them. I knew it also, and thanked God for her sake that Gauthier was here. Not that his presence wasn't a menace; yet at worst he was anxious to save Patchinka's sweet body from danger. She stood firm as a miniature copy of Lot's wife turned to salt, in one small hand the last gift of our Iron Duke. But Wendela—why didn't she squeal, and scamper to the protection of Dupont?

Everything happened so quickly, I had no time to think these thoughts or put these questions to myself. They simply flickered through my brain like moving pictures that run too fast. I knew what I had to do next and I feared what Patchinka was likely to do, but there was no accounting for a girl such as I'd conceived Miss Horden to be. I think Patchinka shared my amazement when Wendela's shoulder snuggled solidly against hers, and the voice which had irritated us so often harangued our enemies whom we supposed her friends.

"No, you don't, Moroni and Gauthier!" she snapped. "Now I see what you meant, Dupont, when you asked me to marry you, so you could 'save me from trouble.' You're all a lot of cheap guys together, and I just dare you to kill Henry S. Horden's Daughter. You'll have to, if you want to shoot up Chris Malet so there!"

On the challenge of Patchinka's silence and Wendela's "cheek," both Gauthier and Dupont sprang forward—or rather Gauthier sprang the seasick Dupont staggered. Without flinching, Patchinka's sister fired, aiming low, to hit Gauthier's leg and trip him. She got the fellow somewhere along the femur. I judged, and at close range. Petro leapt on him, at the same instant. But Mendez grabbed the dog from behind, a hand through his collar that choked the poor boy off ere the strong teeth gripped, and

The Idol of Youth

Gauthier came on, lunging, lurching, cursing, before Patchinka could fire a second shot.

Now was my moment!

No one dared shoot me again, thanks to the girls, and I backed a step or so towards the Mascot.

"Halt!" I yelled. "I've two Mills bombs here. Touch the ladies or take a step nearer, and I blow up the plane. The tank's half full of petrol. Maybe I'll blow myself up too, but who cares! The machine gone, your scheme falls flat. The secret—it's there all right, I happen to know!—goes with it."

"Let him and the women alone," ordered Moroni. "We have them where we want them. They can't get away. And you all know, my friends, what will happen soon. No need to rush things!"

"There is need to rush things," I snapped. "You have us where you want us, all right, but you can't make us do what you want, and you can't do what you want with us. You've given away your Arab snap. I've caught on to the whole show now, and it might have been a good one if it weren't for the Mills. You can't shoot me because of the girls. And if you start to touch them I blow the plane and all that's in it to kingdom come. What can your Arabs do when they turn up? No more than you can?"

"Their head man fought in France," said Moroni. "What he doesn't know about a mitrailleuse—a machine gun—isn't worth knowing. And we've got one—not far out of position. Mohammed Ben Ahmed will soon get the range."

"Pooh!" I laughed, though I'd seldom felt less merry. "How can Hammy pot at me without blowing Miss Kapieha and Miss Horden to bits, to say nothing of the plane?"

This question was easy to ask, but the worst part was that it would be easy to answer too, if the men thought of the right repartee. I was afraid they would. They weren't fools.

It was true, as I'd said, that I could destroy the machine, but even if the girls escaped serious wounds (my Lady from the Air wouldn't budge, I knew, too well), I should probably be killed, and Patchinka and Wendela would be left at the mercy of men who knew not the quality. Two of those men wanted to marry the girls, but the girls didn't want to marry the men. And if a pair of helpless (comparatively helpless!) young women were left unprotected with such brutes in the desert, I saw no alternative for them except complying. Gauthier and Dupont could force marriage upon Patchinka Kapieha and Wendela Horden before help was likely to arrive.

That was what the enemy could reply to me. But as it happened they preferred a different retort.

It was Dupont who spoke. "You understand, I see, that these two ladies are your only screen. And they will not remain where they are now, when we have argued with them—Monsieur Gauthier and I. Miss Horden has a kind heart, but she does not trust you, Monsieur. She knows you have done your best to work against her—that you are a mere creature of Miss Kapieha's; that the two of you would have stolen her property before now if we hadn't watched over it. Miss Horden has only to remember this, to feel that she owes you nothing. No fear! She'll not throw her life away for you. What she wants to save is her aeroplane. Besides, she has promised—practically promised—to marry me."

"That's a lie!" screamed Wendela. "You asked me to marry you, yes, and I flirted a little because I was cross with Chris. But he's my Boy! He says he never meant to cheat me in any shape or way, and now I see what a villain you are, I believe him. He and I are going to be married when we get out of this—as we will get out, you big bullies."

"You and Malet will never be married!" cried Dupont, "I—"

"No, they'll never be married," Patchinka cut him short quietly, "because it is Captain Malet and I who will marry."

Almost Human

Sunday came, bright and hot. Came also wee Billy eager for the "picnic." And a picnic it was—but not of the Sunday School variety.

Our progress on that five-mile trip was of a most uncertain and spasmodic nature. For every mile that "human" boat went, she rested fifteen minutes. At the end of the second stop Charlie wiped his steaming face on his white shirt cuff and wanly remarked,

"Guess she must be overheated."

Accordingly he procured from the seat-boxes some cloths. These he dipped in the water and applied them to the engine.

Molly offered to take over this job. "If we are to keep cold, wet cloths on her forehead," she remarked, "I see where my nursing talents may be turned to good account. 'S far as I can see, this boat expects every man of us this day to do his duty."

"If it's high blood pressure she's got, it's ice packs she needs and not those tepid cloths. But it sounds awfully like croup or whooping cough to me," declared Judy, as the boat began to give out certain wheezy, coughy sounds preparatory to starting. "Did you ask that fat man if she had had all the children's diseases?"

At the wheel I paid no attention to their banter. The Fat One had said that if we treated her decently, she would behave. I wondered what we had done to her to deserve this treatment.

In the stern it required the united vigilance of the rest to keep in check the vixenish activities of young Billy. The seethe within her seemed to increase as the sun moved to its zenith. The lake was wrapped in a Doldrum listlessness. From a "hot and copper sky" the sun beat down on a glassy surface unbroken by any ripple. Our eyes ached with the pitiless glare; our tongues felt as if they would crack if we moved them.

One o'clock came and we were still a mile from our objective. We felt that the end of all things cool and wet and shady had come. Our noses were offended by the malodorous steam which issued from the wet cloths around the engine. Our nerves were raw from the constant noise, and we were hungry. Billy and her sister had long since eaten, and the infuriating sight of food plastered on their countenances added to the torture of all our senses. From noise we were never free; Billy's roars of baffled rage filled the pauses the engine made. At last, however, after a distracted but wholly unintelligible monologue, she fell asleep. And immediately there was a great calm!

Not until two o'clock did we reach the picnic ground and were we able to satisfy our clamorous appetites with fried ham and eggs and other "dainty comeatables," as Judy called them. Just then, like the Lotus Eaters, we felt there was "no joy but calm." Charlie flung himself down under a tree to consider the lilies of the field. He was more fatigued than if he had handled a bean flail for forty-eight consecutive hours. Billy we encouraged to roam at large at risk of her falling into the river. Against an early death we felt she was fully insured—if the good die under two years of age.

An hour later we left the river for home. A gentle south breeze fanned our faces. Things looked brighter for the return journey.

Our hopes were premature. In three miles the boat stopped three times. As before, Charlie knelt with dreary resignation and turned at the wheel. Already he suffered from housemaid's knee. His face was wan and drawn and he had the blighted look of a man who has seen his house and barn burn down from lightning. None of said anything and gluey gloom descended upon us. At the third stop Charlie turned at the wheel till you could have wrung him out.

At last his grim silence broke down. He flung open the flood gates of his speech and a verbal geyser burst forth. It was an orgy of profanity. To put it mildly, he cussed! He cursed motor boats and sons of motor boats unto the third and fourth generation. He swore he'd break every rib in her rotten body. By the nine gods he swore it; in fact he ran the whole god gamut. More inspired cursing I've seldom heard. And after he had thus deluged her, she consented to go.

With grim determination on his face, Charlie took the wheel from me and steered in among the islands to shorten the distance home. In vain I warned him of the danger of rocks now hidden by the slight breeze on the water.

"Got to save time and distance," was all he answered.

I held my breath. The others sat back with a drab indifference to the shaping of events. Then what I expected happened. Came a grating sound and the boat stopped—poised for an instant and then in a sickening manner began to roll from side to side. And at each roll a long-drawn, strangled gasp broke from those on the low side. Then the engine stopped too. I saw no sense in useless toil.

The shelf of rock on which we had grounded lay some two feet under water. Charlie got out into the water and standing on it, shoved with what strength he had left and got us free.

Twice more the boat stopped. The mental cursory remarks we made as we sat frying there were as deep as they were inaudible. Judy amused herself by singing softly a few lines from "Kathleen Mavourneen" beginning with, "It may be for years and it may be forever."

Finally a motor boat appeared from behind the island. With one accord we leaped to our feet and signalled it and were towed home ignominiously.

We felt better when our feet touched soil and our heads got in the shade. But we vowed by the sun and the moon and the stars and the green leaves on the trees that never again would we go picnicing in that boat. We agreed unanimously that if motor boats had not yet been added to the myriad articles consigned to the bulging walls of perdition, it was about time to begin.

We admitted, however, that she was hardy. She had hit and run on rocks without apparent injury, and enough verbal dynamite had been used on her this day to sink any ordinary craft. Her staying powers were unquestioned. Her going powers were what appeared to be lacking.

Next day we 'phoned the Fat One to come out and prescribe for this Kill Joy he had sold us.

He came, he saw, and— "Here's the trouble!" he chuckled. "Y'had the carburetor almost turned off and she wasn't hardly gettin' any gas. Every time she stopped, she had run outa gas. When a little leaked in again, she went on again. Didn't she now?"

We admitted she had done that same. "No motor boat c'n go without gas, y'know," he orated, "any more'n you c'n go without eatin.' A motor boat's just like....."

"The devil, we thought yesterday," Charlie cut in. "Well, here endeth the second lesson! What next? I wonder."

"The Lord only knows!" the Fat One rejoined. He looked as cheerful as a fat tadpole in a sun-bathed pool. He took back with him a perfectly good Five-dollar bill. He had infinite patience with our stupid mistakes.

A little later still another friend visited us at camp, an organist in one of our city churches. She took church work as she did tonsillitis—"painful, frequent and free." In an ill-advised moment I happened to mention that a Sunday School Chautauque was then being held in the large park across the lake. From that moment her soul hungered and thirsted to attend at least one session of that chautauque. "But," I hedged, "I don't see how we can go. This lake has moods, and I'm afraid to go in a canoe. And the motor boat is an uncertain quantity."

Almost Human

Her zeal transcended her fears. "I am not afraid to go in either the canoe or the boat," she declared stoutly.

"But I am afraid," I tried again. "However, if it means an extra star in our crowns, I'm willing to go," I finally conceded.

"You are much more likely to get water in your lungs," Louise, the pessimistic, remarked drily.

We went,—Molly, our two guests, Charlie and myself, and, as my prophetic soul feared, regretted it. Within a few hundred yards of the park the boat stopped and continued to stop. The service at the Park began, and out over the still water, in many-voiced strength, floated "Jesus Saviour, Pilot Me."

Our devotional-minded friend began to get fidgety. "I hate to go in late to church," she complained.

When at last the boat did consent to go, we were an hour late. Charlie "stepped on the gas" and recklessly steered through some floating debris. There came a bump, followed by a harsh grating noise and a timber adorned with vicious looking spikes shot from under the stern.

In answer to my look Charlie postulated, "It won't hurt her; she has a steel keel."

When the service had concluded, darkness was already settling over the sombre woods. Charlie and I hurried to the boat—and my worst fears were confirmed. One fervent, sulphuric monosyllable, not at all in keeping with the religious atmosphere of the place, exploded through Charlie's teeth. The water was up over the floor and would soon reach the batteries.

When the others reached the wharf, Charlie and I were bailing fast and furiously. They wanted to know what had happened and we told them we didn't know.

The boat bailed out, Charlie herded the four of us into the stern and took the wheel. We had taken up the floor of the boat that we might be ready to bail if she began to leak too fast, so whatever spiritual uplift our good friend had got from that service was sadly dampened, I fear, by the watery outlook which confronted her. Gazing into the dark, wet interior of that boat, the vision of a place much warmer and drier may have looked rather good to her.

We made those two miles across to camp without a single stop nor, as far as we could tell, one extra inch of water. The unexpected again. I think it was because of this variableness of character that I still had an attachment for her. If she didn't always please, at least she succeeded in surprising you. Quite sure that the leak was in her bow, we elevated her front end for the night and confidently left her.

In the morning I was not disappointed—in the matter of surprises. The strain of being good the night before had evidently been too much for her. She had collapsed and now lay over on her side and her batteries were drowned. And they were the third set we had bought!

Next day Charlie put a team on her and, by means of a stoneboat, hauled her up high and dry into a field bordering the shore. From there he inspected her from every angle. So also did every man, woman and child in that locality. We half filled her with water, expecting it to run out by the way it had entered and at the end of three days we bailed it out again. We concluded that either she had water on the brain or we had. She was a mystery boat.

We put another set of batteries in her and Charlie anchored her in front of our camp. Molly objected, but Charlie thought she needed a change of scenery and he tied her to a stone large enough to hold an ocean liner.

I now had my work cut out for me. I bailed her out every day. I did not object for, with all her faults I loved her still,—nearly as well, in fact, as when in motion. As she swung at anchor I felt she gave tone to our camp.

One night in mid-August a strong wind blew from the north. Next morning, Louise, being the first up, woke us up with the information:

"Girls, your motor boat is gone!"

After the first shock I said some things to which Molly could add nothing. Anyway, no shock could arouse her jaded interest in that boat. We ate our breakfast in volcanic calm. Then I took the "Suffragette" and paddled to Charlie's.

"Foul play!" was his vehement verdict.

In his row boat we patrolled the entire lake from a point south of our camp in search of the truant. We felt that even she could not be contrary enough to drift against the wind. At noon I returned to camp disheartened.

"She must have gone to the bottom," I concluded my report.

"Requiescat in pace!" Molly pronounced with dramatic solemnity.

"Gone, but not forgotten!" was Louise's addition to the requiem.

But I refused to let her rest in peace or to forget her and I said as much—and some more.

In the afternoon Charlie came hurrying over to camp with a clue of the vagrant one. Following it up, we found her anchored at the end of an island where some fishermen had towed her. She was full of water. We were sure her batteries would be gone. "But just for fun," Charlie ventured "I'll try the wheel."

In the long list of charges in money and effort laid to that boat's account, we have nothing down against her for that afternoon. True, Charlie had lost almost a whole day from his farm in the busy harvest season, and on our return journey we lost an expensive pair of field glasses. But on the credit side of the account is the fact that she took us back to camp that afternoon. Moreover, she appeared to be uninjured.

"This boat beats me!" Charlie exclaimed with joyous exhilaration. "She must have pounded on those rocks for hours. So much for a steel keel!"

Regretfully I write the finis to the story of this boat that was almost human. To the last I was loyal to her. In the face of losses and crosses, when everyone had cursed her from stern to stern, I still retained a fondness for her. But, I fell out with her—because I fell out of her.

Towards the last, about all she would do of a positive nature was to leak. So one sunny afternoon I ordered all hands into bathing suits, and after three hours' hard labor, we got her up on to a sort of rude weighs of cord wood blocks. With these we also propped her in place.

Then the others went for a car ride and I remained behind, tired but happy. For, after having put several pails of water into her I discovered it dripping out from the propeller plate. I felt the discovery was valuable.

In the evening I again donned my bathing suit and with considerable difficulty climbed into her. Alone I could gratify my love of boats without being asked by the others why I "puddled in that miserable boat." So I gratified my love of "Puddling"; then I sat down to dream.

It's all very well for the poets to sing, "Only the dreams are real." Take it from me, it isn't so! Your material surroundings insist upon being the real. The poets too, I fancy, get their dash of cold water in the face to recall them to the real. Certain it is, I got mine! I must have described a double somersault before I struck the water, face downward.

I crawled miserably to the shore. Below my knee on the shin a lump was rising, and I saw with pained surprise that the skin from the top of that lump was missing. Two days later the surrounding area shone forth in beautiful prismatic colorings. It looked like a painter's palette. A scar still remains, after two years, to remind me not to put my faith in motor boats.

That was the last straw.

The Idol of Youth

"I'll kill you rather than that!" broke out Gauthier. "I love every hair of your head, but—"

"Kill nobody!" shrilled Wendela. "Once a cat, always a cat—that's Miss Kapiha! Chris Malet swore by all that's sacred he wouldn't propose to her, and he never has or will, so—"

"But I propose to him," said Patchinka. "I knew you'd made him promise not to speak. You bought him that way, with my brother's aeroplane. He never told me—yet I felt it. One night coming out of the Casino I looked at him—and he turned away his eyes. Then I knew. But I only smiled. He'll remember that moment. He never guessed I cared as a woman cared—we had too much to plan and do, for me to dare let him see my heart at first. But I've loved him since the night when he saved my life—my life that's been his ever since. And his was mine, for he loved me. Never would he have done what he has done for me, if not; no man would. We'll be husband and wife, or we'll die together this night—is it not so, Duguesclin?"

"It is so," I said. And my heart sang, though still I saw no way out of the danger for her and me, or even for Wendela—unless Wendela weakened. This time, if I had laughed, it would not have been a false laugh, for there was a wild humour in our duel of words here in the night and the desert dunes, in our scene of love and hate so hastily thrown together without rehearsal—just one short scene in a big act which might end with a crash of tragedy, as no love scene should. But I didn't laugh; I just looked at Patchinka, who had turned to me; and for a second—no more, perhaps—we forgot everything else and every-body.

"Now, Mademoiselle, you know this hound for what he is," Dupont brought me to myself by a shout to Wendela. "Leave him. Come to me. What if that girl dies too? She deserves it. Forget the man. Save yourself. You shall be happy. Your father—"

"I wish to goodness my father was here!" sobbed Wendela, bursting into tears. "I'm no Apache queen; I'm just a Dutch-American girl, and I'll live up to it no matter how cruelly folks deceive me. I'll show these two what I think of 'em afterwards. But I'm going to stand pat now. You spatter Chris Malet and that Patchinka thing over this landscape and you'll spatter me too. Then you'll have Henry Horden on your backs. He'll break 'em!"

"Henry Horden is very far away," Dupont reminded her, as we three united for the first time close together, and Petro—half-choked, struggled to his feet to crawl towards us. "Henry Horden will accept me for his son-in-law, rather than—"

"Hst! Here they come. I see figures!" broke in Mendez. "The Arabs!"

CHAPTER XLIV

All's Well.

IT was true. Figures, many figures were coming. I, who dared not turn for fear of treachery, saw the black forms moving only in one direction. They approached from the South (I knew it was south, by the stars) so they must be from Hamada; the oasis village lay there. There was no thought in my head but that Mendez was right and the Arabs were on their way to help the men who'd hired them. I thought dully but obstinately that a hundred men could do little more harm than four, as long as we held together under the power of my threat.

Patchinka too, was motionless, her weapon cocked and aimed. But Wendela was unarmed and irresponsible. "Why, they're coming from everywhere!" she exclaimed. "They're hemming us in with a kind of ring! There must be hundreds—a thousand! I wonder—"

We had forgotten Petro since he had stumbled up after the choking and we'd made sure he wasn't dead. But now he recalled himself to our minds by being very much alive. With a bound a terrier might have envied, that solid bull of British breed leapt past the enemy group into the desert. Mendez sent a shot after him, but it didn't hit. That low-gear, four-legged form sped on, black against the pale sand as were the forms of running men. He reached them as they came, was lost to sight among them; and then a voice rang out. "Bon chien! Sapristi—un bulldog Anglais! C'est le Capitaine Malet qui et la, avec cet aeroplane?"

A good French voice—no Arab's, spoiling the French language. Besides, the speaker knew my name—he sought me. A dazzling vision glittered in my brain, and I saw more stars than were ever in the heavens.

"Oui!" I roared. "C'est Monsieur Horden qui—"

"Oui, oui, Horden! Je suis Dubois, lieutenant 2ieme Regiment de la Legion Etrangere, en manoeuvre dans le voisinage. Horden a telegraphie—"

Saved—all of us! My darling Lady from the Air, and Wendela and Petro and myself—unless, well, there was time still for the Syndicate to shoot us, since they'd lost the game and need care no longer whether or not I bombed the Mascot.

Just as I was thanking heaven that I'd wired Horden from Monte Carlo. I realized with a sharp pang how much can happen in a minute: it would be a minute before the Legion men could get near enough to see which was which of us. But the Syndicate was dazed by the shock of surprise, and it was only Gauthier whose wits were on the spot. Patchinka aflame with joy, believed the battle over. Slightly her weapon dropped, and Gauthier caught her unawares. A spring, a push, and he'd swept the brave, slight sentinel aside like a feather. Down she went, and up went his automatic. I should have had a bullet through my brain (since the Mills would have bombed Patchinka with him) if the girl hadn't seized the staggering man by his wounded leg and tripped him.

The Colt fired as he fell, but hurt no one, though Wendela screamed. Then I was on the fellow. I'd wrenched his revolver away, jerking him up with one hand through his collar, to swing the bomb I still held (its mate I'd carefully dropped on the sand) to warn the Syndicate, when the ring of soldiers' closed in.

"I'm Malet," I said (I'm afraid I gasped) "and these four chaps plotted to rob and murder me. They wanted the aeroplane (which has valuables concealed in it) and two of them wanted to kidnap these ladies—or if not, kill them."

"We're not policemen to arrest thieves, but we capture these men as bandits," announced Dubois.

The Legionnaires made short work of obeying his order, and I could have danced with glee at sight of the four under guard at last, if I hadn't yearned to know if Patchinka were hurt by her fall. I snatched her up from the sand where she lay slightly stunned, and held her in my arms for the second time in our acquaintance.

"I'm all r-right," she faltered, with that dear little roll of the "r" which I loved so, "only—frightened—I thought Gauthier would kill you that time. Then I should have died. Once I wished to die, but I don't wish it now."

"If I once saved you, you saved me to-night, so we're quits," I whispered, and I whispered a few other words too.

It was the hardest thing on earth not to kiss her, but before a regiment of soldiers I—well, it's not done, you know, except in the "movies." If we'd been characters on the screen, I should have had to kiss my girl there and then,—soldiers or no soldiers—because that rescue in the desert by Legionnaires would have needed the fifth and last reel—nothing must prevent the hero from

THE joys of holiday-time are at their height in August:—and we are even more eager for the summer-time pleasure than we were, early in the season. The Canadian summer is so "cruelly brief," that most citizens of this country make the best of the season when "God's own out-doors" has flung wide its golden gates. There is something delightfully languid about August. June is the bride's month, when every town is strewn with confetti. Of late years, too, it seems to be the month of conventions, when Daughters of the Empire, members of the National Council of Women and Kiwanians of kindly mien go to and fro, pass resolutions and have a happy time at strawberry festivities, in spite of strikes and rumors of war.

July means a rush for the river, the lake and the mountains. It is a month of glorious excitement, with "the first fine careless rapture" of holidays filling the youthful heart. If you are so lucky as to possess a cottage in the North Country, where the lakes are many and the hills are blue, there is something wonderfully exhilarating in those first days of drinking in the health of pine-scented air and plunging in the cool waters for an early swim.

"There is only one objection I have to my wife," said an exceedingly domesticated citizen—"and that is, she cannot take a holiday. Every year I beg her not to take the trouble to 'keep house' in camp, but just to let things go. There's no holiday in taking city life to Muskoka."

"I've often noticed," said the Tennis Girl, "that men turn more naturally to gypsy life than women do. They like to get back to fishing and camp fires and sleeping in the wood."

"Perhaps we're lazier," admitted the man. "But let me tell you there's no greater mistake than keeping your nose everlastingly to the grindstone. You work all the better for letting things go for a while and taking a real and thorough holiday. So long as we had a summer cottage, though, my wife would do as much work in Muskoka as if we were at home. So, now I insist on going for two weeks to a hotel which isn't fashionable but where the cooking is good. Mary can't do any work but crochet on the verandah. The last two years, she's actually lost interest in the crocheting and comes out with me when I go fishing. Last year she was more excited than I was when I caught that big 'lunge'. I tell you, that fish was a bird. Did I ever tell you just how—"

He had told us several times about the "how" of that 'lunge', but we listened again and thought Mary a very sensible woman to form a silent partner on a fishing trip, instead of continuing a deep interest in crochet designs. After all, a camisole or a pair of cuffs can be made any day; but the fishing weeks are too briefly glorious to be spent on the verandah.

A woman who is the mother of four boys was asked the other day: "How is it that your boys like to stay home? You don't seem to have much trouble in having them in, before it's midnight. So many boys are running loose these days that it's a comfort to call on someone in the evening and find one or two boys having a good time at home."

"I don't know that there's any secret about it," said the woman thoughtfully, "unless it is that my husband and I have always tried to keep up an interest in the boys' hobbies. I insist on a general cleaning up in the evening, but the boys have always been allowed to bring their toys or tools into the house and do what they please. Billy was keen about wireless years ago, and we learned about it with him, instead of discouraging him when he wanted to 'listen in.' Of course, I've had to give up several things, in order to keep up with Billy's wireless and Percy's pigeons, to say nothing of John's vegetable plot. That boy is a born gardener and won't be happy until he has acres of potatoes and corn all his own."

"Isn't it rather narrowing, though, to devote so much time to their hobbies?" asked a Superior Person.

"Quite the contrary," was the reply. "How many women take an interest in anything scientific or mechanical? I have not had time to take much interest in my neighbors' affairs and I don't care in the least to hear that Mr. Brown is neglecting his wife and taking his stenographer to the most luxurious movie theatre twice a week. But I do hear a good deal about Edison and Marconi and Burbank. I read something more than current fiction and when the boys talk about the Mount Everest expedition, I know what they are discussing and something about mountain climbing. Narrowing! I can tell you that if you try to keep up with the hobbies of your growing boys, you'll learn more than you ever believed possible. I haven't time for bridge or many teas, but I'm interested in something more than the latest novel or the most recent scandal in Hollywood."

The Superior Person was crushed for the moment, but the inquiring friend who had wished to know why the boys stayed home in the evening said appreciatively:

"I don't see how you get through it all, though. And you made that new organdy gown yourself—the one with the picot-edged frills."

"Oh, never forget the frills," admonished the hobby-sympathizer. "Frills are always part of the game."

Needed by Every Baby

Here are two powders essential to the health and comfort of your Baby.

You, of course, know Mennen Borated Talcum. It has been endorsed and insisted upon by three generations of mothers, nurses and doctors, because it is pure, has a correctly balanced formula and is more adhesive than ordinary talc.

Kora-Konia is not a talcum. It is a combination of healing and protective agents and is wonderfully efficient for prickly heat, chafing and baby rashes. It places on inflamed flesh a velvety film of cooling, soothing powder, which clings for a long time, protecting while it heals.

Have you sent for Aunt Belle's Baby Book? It is a substantial book, in stiff covers, and contains all you need to know about babies. It will help you every day to keep Baby healthy and happy. It costs only 25 cents. In de luxe binding—$1.50

BABY BOOK

THE crape on the bell reassured him. Just at the moment his mother had 'phoned he had been so very much occupied with his own thoughts that he feared he might have incorrectly copied the street number on his blotting-pad while promising mechanically to go to the funeral. Only the fact of his old nurse's death and the necessity of going within the hour had pierced his mind, and he had fortunately hooked up the receiver before his sweet-voiced mother could detect his anger. Since illness had prevented her from going herself, he would not for worlds have hurt her by refusing, and then somebody simply had to go. None the less he had been extremely vexed.

It had been the one time when he desired nothing external to turn aside, even temporarily, his determination; he had suspected its strength. For nights he had been struggling with himself, but now that he had made up his mind to do the "thing," and had been expecting "them" at any moment for his final answer, he had not wanted the slightest slanting incident to interfere. It was true some people might have thought it a dishonest thing, and so had he at first; but as he had examined it more closely in the light of its real advantages to him, he had accused himself of overnice quibbling. Besides, it would make certain his reelection, and once back in Washington, he would continue to do as much good as ever for his constituents. It had not been for himself, then, that he had resolved to do the wrong—if that were the word. But he had not been anxious, either, to linger with his state of mind; it made him strangely uncomfortable; and though he was positive it was not his conscience which bothered him, he had been convinced he would be more at ease once his determination had been translated into the visible action. Then there would be no retreat; that would force him to look only ahead. Still, in spite of all this, it was possible "they" might be a trifle late in arriving, and perhaps he would not be over long either. So glancing at his watch he had left his study quickly, seeing he had barely time to cross the Bridge before the service would begin.

As his machine had begun to nose inquiringly amid the crooked streets the fear that he might not find the number after all had gradually distracted his mind from the "thing." Suddenly remembering he had brought no flowers, he stopped before a small unostentatious shop with wire moulds and animated mottoes bulging in the window. At his request the old florist had immediately begun, with twisted nail-nipped fingers, to sort the frail white flowers of grief. He had started to sound the florist about the political situation in that district, but was shocked at his lack of interest in a thing so vital. He had been a bit hurt also that the old man had not recognized him. Even though he had thrown out pointed hints about the many events already in his young career, and even though he had suggested discreetly that he was the coming man, still, unimpressed and disinterested, the weak-eyed storekeeper whose life lay amid flowers and not in the world of big events, had only mounted the delicate blossoms into a long plaintive sheath. He questioned whether the recent hard times had depressed the business of flower selling, but the old man only answered that people always bought flowers; they were the language of joy and of sorrow, of greeting and of parting, of life and of death. He had instinctively been glad to leave the shop. He hated the sentimentalist,—people who maundered in emotion and never did anything—as he did.

When he had discovered the crape on the bell he had breathed a sigh of relief, and left his machine. Now as he pressed through the calicoed and ginghamed children, who, clustered about the door which hid the event, were staring at him in open-eyed interest and thumb-mouthed wonder, it struck him how kind it was of him to go to all this bother over his old nurse. She could never know what he was doing, but it was a pretty bit of devotion to her memory, and then perhaps some reporter might learn of the episode. So as he walked up the red-carpeted steps, he stifled the last bit of remaining anger at its interruption in his scheme of things.

They greeted him at the head of the stairs; somebody must have told the others who he was, for he immediately saw they were correctly effusive. They took his hat and the flowers which were such damp and drippy things to hold. They ushered him into the front room. There were no shutters on the windows; the half-lowered shades were white and made no attempt to keep out either the light or the puffy summer breeze. As he was led ceremoniously to the place where she lay so quietly, he wondered whether the children in the street were dancing now to the organ which was incongruously grinding out its jiggling tunes. Someone lifted the covering with a touch of pride, he thought—for it was all their own. He looked at her through the well-polished glass. She had changed.

He was glad when he could sit in the large imposing chair near the corner to wait for the service to begin. He should like to have been left entirely alone with his emotions, for he felt them adapting themselves nicely to the situation; but the family would buzz about him and formally present their friends. They were all in black and for the first time he realized he had not changed his suit, as he should have, of course. It did seem a little out of keeping, that under the circumstances he should be the obvious centre of attraction, but he had long since learned to accept attention and he supposed that would always be his lot. There were only a few, however, seven or eight, to be precise, besides the family, and he thought of the family. There was the daughter, and the son and the daughter's husband—that was all. Only three who really belonged there.

THE thin-lipped daughter sat beside him at first and told with infinite detail of her mother's last few days, of how often she had thought of him and of his mother and of her long years in his family. He dimly began to see he had meant something to the old nurse—and he was glad he regretted for a moment that he had resented coming. Her son came up, too, and greeted him with a firm grip. He liked the keen eager eyes and the aggressive point to his chin, but he was surprised to see in neither one of her children the slightest trace of the humbleness of their origin. He had remembered the nurse had been common—the face of the nurse, he meant, as he had known it in the past. She had never used the most correct grammar, and she had never learned to read or write. But her children had. He recalled from the scraps his mother had told him at odd times in his relaxed tolerating moments, of their progress and their success in the world. He could see, too, very clearly from their speech and manner, they were quite different from the mother. He could not help recording these things, as he was saying appropriate words of sympathy and impatiently awaiting the minister.

The minister came after a time and as he saw the white-surpliced man standing in the doorway hesitating, he vaguely felt the rivalry in the attention the others would give. A frail saw-toothed woman with deep-set nervous eyes passed about some prayer books, and he took one, which opened ironically enough at the baptismal service. He would have liked to have moralized over this, but the minister had entered the room, and had begun to read in a sing-song voice. Somehow the voice was different from what he had expected, it did not seem to fit the much-lined bad-toothed countenance. It was also without spontaneity—its quaverings were so automatic. It jerked along like the phonographic needle rising and falling on the wax record. He tried to pay attention, but his mind would wander; besides, he never liked to hear other people talk.

He began to take in the room. It did not fit in with his preconceived idea, either. It was so clean and measured. Save for the slight rumple on the rug where the minister was standing and a gaping tear in the orange wall-paper above the mantel, everything was in order. The pictures on the wall lacked some uniformity, but one of them at least, an engraving, showed taste; it was a Venus de Milo. He smiled to himself that they should own that common picture. But then, as his mind slipped on, he remembered he himself had sent it as a wedding present to the daughter. There was a silent haunched piano in the corner, too, near some camp-chairs which yawned emptily, and he asked himself who it was that played.

And then his mind was startled. Far in the alcove he saw a folding bed—a nice, open bed with brass designs and an inviting top. The past swooped down on him, for it was the bed he had tossed in as a young man. His mother must have given it to the old nurse when the home had been broken up after his marriage. Yes, it was the same faithful bed—perhaps it was the one in which the sick woman herself had lain. He did not like to think that; it grated his social sense. Yet near it, too, he recognized the odd low caned-back chair in which he had so often lolled and dreamed of his future greatness. It seemed a trifle different; it had been recolored, and the cushions were of cheaper grade, but he could not mistake its peculiar attitude. It brought things back, and as he slowly removed the veils of his past few tumultuous years, the sharp outline of that younger man strode forth. He had affectionate regard for that younger man, almost as he would have for a younger brother. For he was so honest and upright. Not that he had ever changed, oh, no,—only life had brought so many problems—the soft fuzz had to go and knowledge itself had dulled the thin edges.

Gradually, as he also allowed a warmth of pathos to creep into his soul and he let the reserves and defences, the strains and tensions of the older man melt away, his little hand once again trustingly sought the old nurse, and he walked with her gently through the sunny days of the long ago. How good she had always been to him! How she must have loved him! He realized that now, and he was not ashamed to acknowledge it gladly to himself. When his parents had gone away she had tended him herself for weeks at a time, guiding his scattered impulses, admonishing his inquiring tendencies. Small fragments of the forgotten danced before him: the holes in his long stockings which she would always mend, the secret slices of sugared bread she would give him after school, the cup of cold water his hot lips would cry for in the night. As he looked back he saw there had been a note of love, not the metallic return of bought service.

And later when he had grown beyond her need and she had still lingered in the old home in one capacity or another, because there was always something she alone could do, even then he would talk with her and confide his little secrets of battle or sentiment. In all the years he had never heard her complain, never consciously rebel against the many bleeding things life had brought her—the drunken husband, or the two fatherless children and the old crippled mother she had cared for. She had managed to do it somehow, as she had managed to do everything.

ONCE after her mother had mercifully died, he remembered seeing her smiling with satisfaction before a pile of bank-notes which her fore-sight kissing the heroine then! Of course, the close of the play means that the lovers "fade out" in the "clinch," but we didn't fade out in the least; far from it!

First of all, there was some shaking hands, and some explaining. Henry Horden hadn't himself sent the telegram. He was and is a master man; but even he couldn't expect to have his orders blindly obeyed by la Legion Etrangere. Indeed, he wouldn't have known that the Legion was marching and manoeuvring in the neighbourhood of Hamada, if it hadn't been for a friend of his in Paris, whose brother was Colonel of the 2nd Regiment, stationed at Saida. The news of the great march had come in a letter from the Colonel to that friend. With his usual quickness, Horden had seen and snatched at a way out of a trap. At his request, a long message was wired to the Colonel at Hamada; danger of death to Miss Horden, her friends and her aeroplane; an ambush prepared; the plane lured to alight near the oasis.

So, after a fashion, Wendela was the leading lady of the drama in the eyes of the Legion, and especially those of Lieutenant Dubois. Kapiha's sister ran Miss Horden close as favourite, when I made known the slim pilot's identity. But Wendela was IT. The little, dark French officer admired her plump fairness; also apparently the splendid ermine so detested by Petro, and so symbolic of the Great World.

We were invited to rest at the Legion's camp, so near Hamada that the hired Arabs could never have overwhelmed us if they'd tried; the ladies were told by Dubois that only an attack of heat-stroke that day had kept his captain from leading the rescue party. There would be a tent "pour les demoiselles," however; and food for all. But when I explained (I did explain frankly) the secret of Kapiha's aeroplane, Dubois realized that we could not leave the machine until we had its hidden treasures in our grasp.

It took Patchinka and me an incredibly short time to find and secure them, now that there was no one to impede our movements. And can you conceive the extra joy we felt in exploring the petrol tank under the Syndicate's eyes? There they were, in durance vile, unable to do more than stare, unless they chose to gnash their teeth, an expression of rage which I believe is out of date. Besides, Mendez' teeth and some of Moroni's were false.

In the presence of all, I separated the metal case from the support to which it still remained attached since I'd stuffed up on the open end with fluffy wool at Ajaccio. My plug had kept in place. Not another pearl had escaped after the six I'd concealed in my pocket. Into Patchinka's hands I poured the broken string of cream-white beauties for her to count. With those I annexed, the number was right; and I would have given the metal case itself to the girl to examine, if she hadn't waved it aside.

"That is for a man's hands to do," she said. "And you are the man."

So I found—as I expected to do—an inner compartment in the cylinder. It remained intact, but I opened it with a blade of the old knife which had served me that afternoon (it seemed a month ago!) and drew out a thin roll of oiled India paper. Kapiha's Mascot had kept his secret well! I wondered if his spirit were near us, or if it had gone to tell the news to his loved Laurette?

We didn't wait on the spot to examine the documents, though Patchinka's future fortune might be in them. When Dubois again suggested camp, however, I delayed him a moment.

"Just let us get this matter cleared up before we start if you don't mind," I said. "There are some details we must explain to Miss Horden. Now, this is the way things stand. These pearls were to have paid her father for an advance of money he made to Sacha Kapiha, early in 1914. They belonged to Sacha's sister and were in Vilna. Miss Kapiha

—a school-girl of fifteen then, started to fetch them. She was caught by the war. But she determined her brother should keep his word. An airman was about to fly to France—if he could get there. She asked him to take this bulldog—Petro. And inside a special collar the dog carried these pearls. Miss Kapiha learned that the bull dog reached Sacha safely. About the pearls she never heard. It was only when Mr. Horden told her he'd not received them (he'd left Paris in haste as war broke out) that Miss Kapiha guessed they might be papers, Miss Horden may think, because the aeroplane is hers, that—"

"Mais, ca va sans dire!" cried Dubois, so excited that he forgot this business wasn't his.

Wendela turned upon him—not sharply, as she often had upon me, but with an almost childlike question. "What goes without saying?" she asked.

"Pardon, Mademoiselle!" the Frenchman stammered. "I spoke without knowing I spoke aloud. The case is so clear! It is for you to decide—but you can see it only in one way."

This beautiful photograph of midsummer blooms is from the studio of Mr. I. T. Parker, High River, Alberta hidden in the aeroplane. Sacha had told her of a secret place in it, he'd made to keep papers and valuables. Well, now we have both the papers and the pearls—in our hands. There's no question as to the owner of the pearls. It's Mr. Horden. He mentioned that, if he could have taken them back to America in 1914, he'd have made them a present to his wife. Anyhow they're his. As to the

"Oh!" said Wendela. She cocked her blonde head on one side. "Why, yes, of course. You've not heard the whole story. In some ways Miss Kapiha hasn't treated me very nicely. But I'm not one to bear a grudge. And no matter what she's done to me, I wouldn't cheat her for anything. The papers no matter if they're worth millions as those

BABY HEALTH CENTRES

THERE are many names for them. You may call them Child Hygiene Stations or Well-Baby Clinics or Infant Consultations or Schools for Mothers or Babies' Welcomes, or Infant Welfare Centres or any other name you please. Most of our Canadian Child Welfare Centres are known by the name used as a title for this article.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH NURSE

Next to the Real Canadian Mother the Public Health Nurse can do more for the Baby than anyone else because she can help the mother more than anyone else and she "knows how." Most Canadian Mothers are intelligent and have had experience and know how to manage houses and bring up children. But these Mothers, before and after the first baby came, would have been so glad if they had had a Real Public Health Nurse to help them. Many of them would like to have her right now to help them.

Very likely the Public Health Nurse does not know any more than the Mother's Mother, or the Mother's Mother's Mother knew. But Mothers and Grandmothers have had to re-organize themselves to meet the demands of Re-construction and Modern Life, and things are not what they used to be and you know very well that the Mother needs some one to help her. The best helper yet discovered is the Public Health Nurse and she is a good helper.

"I LOST MY BABY."

So often the first baby does not survive.

"I lost my baby," said a woman in this office yesterday, speaking about her first-born. "The Doctor was a long time before he could come, and I lost my baby."

Too bad. Their first-born was as precious to that Canadian Father and Mother as Edward, Prince of Wales is to King George and Queen Mary. Care of the Mother before the Baby came and when the Baby came would have saved that First Baby.

"WHY DOESN'T THE FAMILY PHYSICIAN DO IT?"

Why don't I look after the Mothers and Babies in my own practice, you say. Well, I do try to look after them. But do you know how many Doctors there are in Canada now? A little over five thousand. And what is our population? About nine million according to the Census of 1921. About one physician to eighteen hundred population. Too many for one Doctor, especially when you remember, and you always should remember, the places in Canada where there are very few people per square mile and there is no Doctor nearer than twenty miles.

And the economic question will not down. There are a very large number of people who cannot afford to have a Doctor. Why do they not go to the hospitals? Ah—that is too late!

DON'T WAIT TILL THE BABY IS SICK

What we want to do is not to wait till the baby is sick and then try to cure him, if we can. We want to prevent the baby getting sick at all. A baby should never need to go to the Hospital if we had a little more intelligence and common sense and gave the Mother and Baby a chance

KEEP THE WELL BABY WELL

Have You got That Into Your Head? A Baby Health Centre is to keep the Well Baby Well. Our far-too-high Infant Mortality Rate in Canada is the terrible price we pay for not teaching and helping the Mother and giving her and her Baby a Chance.

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics at Ottawa reports that the number of babies born in Canada in 1920 was 247,219, and that our Infant Mortality Rate was one hundred out of every thousand births. That is, we lost in that year 24,721 babies under one year of age. In other words, we lose every day sixty-seven Canadian Babies. Sixty-seven funerals every day following the white hearse.

THE DOMINION OF NEW ZEALAND KNOWS HOW

If Canada were like New Zealand, there would only have been thirty-three funerals! The Dominion of New Zealand is twice as successful in caring for Babies as the Dominion of Canada. The Babies' Consultations in New Zealand are very successful, but not a bit more successful than they are going to be in Canada. When?—That depends on you.

HOW WE COULD DO IT

Now how does the Baby Health Centre keep the Healthy Baby Healthy?

Wait a minute. Would you know a Baby Health Centre if you saw it? You want to know how to start it, and what it will cost and about the furniture and the equipment and all about it? Very well.

THE INDISPENSABLES

But let me tell you that there is one "Indispensable" in the Baby Health Centre and that is the right kind of Nurse. What about the Doctor, you say? I know you need a Doctor. It may be that the Doctors will "take turns," or that one Doctor will take it for three months, and each of three others will do the same. But after all, the success of the Clinic depends on the Nurse. She must be the right kind of woman, and she must have right feelings and instincts and she must have had a good training in the care of mothers and children, and she must be able to go on learning, and she must have her heart in her work, and be able to see the "Other Person's Side"—whether that "Other Person" be the Mother or the Father or the Neighbour, or the Doctor, or His Worship the Mayor. Because of course, in the end, it is the municipality that finances the Baby Health Centre, and this investment pays the city something over one thousand per cent. Put it in the Budget—"Estimates for the Health Department." The Medical Officer of Health manages the whole thing. Of

How To Be Free From Laxatives

Science has found a Newer, Better Way to Overcome Constipation

THE wide-spread use of laxatives and cathartics has caused medical authorities to issue a warning regarding their use in the treatment of constipation.

An eminent physician says that an inestimable amount of injury is done by the use of these intestinal irritants, most of which provide temporary relief only at the expense of permanent injury. Another even goes so far as to say that all laxatives are irritant poisons which affect the stomach, as well as the colon and small intestine. In time, he asserts, their long continued use gives rise to gastric and intestinal catarrh, colitis and the varied evils which accompany these disorders, especially hemorrhoids, appendicitis, and intestinal toxemia, as well as an aggravation of the constipation which they are given to relieve.

No wonder that science has sought a newer, better way. After years of study there has been found in lubrication, a means as simple as nature itself.

Lubrication

In perfect health a natural lubricant keeps the food waste soft. Thus it is easily eliminated. But when you are constipated, this natural lubricant is not sufficient.

To find something to take the place of this natural lubricant, leading medical authorities conducted exhaustive research. They have discovered that the gentle lubricating action of Nujol most closely resembles that of Nature's own lubricant. As Nujol is not a laxative it cannot gripe. It is not a medicine in any sense of the word and, like pure water, it is harmless. These facts have led to its adoption in leading hospitals throughout the world for the treatment of constipation. Specialists consider it indispensable in treating chronic constipation.

The lubricating action of Nujol has helped thousands of people to overcome constipation, and free themselves from laxatives and cathartics, thereby wonderfully increasing their capacity for usefulness, activity and enjoyment of life.

Test Nujol yourself. For sale at any drug store. Send coupon today for booklet.

Canning by the Cold-Pack Method

as the liquid in the jars, the water should reach two or three inches over the tops of the jars. Put cover on boiler and bring to a quick boil. Cook products according to time table. Do not begin to count time until the water is rapidly boiling and keep the water boiling constantly. If undercooked the product will not keep, if overcooked it may lose flavor, color and texture.

Sealing: As soon as the product has cooked at a boiling temperature the number of minutes indicated in the time table, remove the jars from the bath, examine rubbers, and completely seal. If rubbers soften or bulge in cooking, replace quickly with another sterilized rubber and replace the jar in the sterilizer for five minutes. Protect jars from draughts when removing from bath to avoid breakage and place them where they will not be disturbed until seal sets.

Canned products will keep if properly sterilized even though jars are not full. It is not safe to open a jar to put in more material, this would necessitate complete re-sterilization. The jar loses liquid in cooking when the lid is too loosely adjusted, when products are sufficiently blanched or when water does not extend one inch above tops of jars.

Time Table for Vegetables:

Product	Blanch	Process
Beans, Lima	omit	three hours
Asparagus	eight minutes	two and one-half hours
Beans, string	omit	three hours
Beets	fifteen minutes	two and one-half hours
Corn	five minutes	four hours
Greens (Spinach, Chard, etc.)	twenty minutes	two hours over
Peas	steam	three hours
Peppers	omit	two hours
Tomatoes	one and one-half minutes	twenty-five minutes

Asparagus and beans, corn, peas should never be canned in any container holding more than a quart. If pint jars are used do not lessen the time of sterilizing.

Syrups for Canning fruits: Fruits may be canned successfully without the addition of sugar, but most of them require some sugar for flavor and there is no special advantage in omitting it unless sugar is scarce or high in price. If such is the case, the sugar may be added at serving time. Just enough sugar should be used to bring out the flavor, not to obscure it. In judging the amount of syrup to make, it is important to know that large fruits require about twice as much syrup to fill the jar as small fruits, owing to the large spaces between. The simplest method in making syrup is to have one formula which may be made into thin, medium or thick by boiling. Syrup will keep several days.

Almost Human

"We'll get rid of her!" Charlie declared emphatically. "We'll sell her back to the fat freak you got her from."

Sadly I agreed. I hated to part with this almost human boat—but she was hopeless. We notified Fatty. He looked her over and shook his head. And that head-shake prepared us for our financial loss. We had paid two-hundred dollars for her, and sold her back to Fatty—as is," as he put it, for fifty.

Fatty towed the boat to his dock and fixed her up again—possibly for the nth time. And then I made a discovery. A week after we sold the boat back to Fatty I saw her again. And I recognized her immediately, nobody could have fooled me with that boat.

I was out in the canoe, and she passed me. There was a lady in her—a lady and Fatty. And as they passed me I caught Fatty's high-voiced voice. This is what he was telling the lady.

So he says to me, "sacrifice her for a quick sale, an' that's what I'm doin'." But somehow I hate t' part with her, fer I've become sort o' attached t' her. Seem's almost as if she was human.

course often some Voluntary Association does it first, and then the local authorities (M.O.H.), "take it over." She has a personality, our Nurse has. She is a friendly person, who thinks well of human nature and she looks so clean and neat and nice that the Doctor knows he could trust her with a surgical case.

THE PLACE

But she is not on Surgical Nursing at present. She is looking for a place to establish a Baby Health Centre, and being like Kipling's Mariner, a person of infinite resource and sagacity, she wants to get The Centre in the right place, the strategic point, as it were, of the District. Where that is will depend on circumstances. Sometimes it may be near a playground or park; sometimes, but not always, in a Church House, and I have seen a very good one in a vacant store, which was available that winter for a reasonable rent.

Two rooms there must be, even for a small centre, and if more than ten babies and their Mothers are to be there at one time, three rooms are necessary. Even in the smallest centre, three rooms are desirable, because you need a comfortable room where the mothers and babies wait their turn, and a room where the mother and baby are admitted when they are "Next," and where the baby can be undressed, and finally a room for the Doctor. The baby is weighed in the Second room or else in the Doctor's room. The Doctor's consultation room should have the best light and all the rooms should be of a comfortable temperature and well-ventilated. Sanitary conveniences are necessary, and a place outside, where the perambulators are safe and conveniently placed, is needed too.

The usual time to hold the Consultation is in the afternoon, and at many centres, especially where there are voluntary workers, a bun or biscuit or a glass of milk or a "cup which cheers but not inebriates" is ready for the mothers. It is usually better to have a nominal charge for this. A Baby Health Centre is not a Charitable Agency or a place where people get something for nothing.

EDUCATION IN CHILD WELFARE

A Baby Health Centre is an Educational Institution and its appeal is not to cupidity or selfishness, but to duty, the love of learning, to patriotism and to family affection and the love of home life. All the workers, official and voluntary, should remove their hats and outer garments when on duty and wear well-made white aprons, or coats over their ordinary clothes. Their appearance should be in every way attractive, and worthy of the important work in which they are engaged.

WHERE DOES THE MONEY COME FROM?

The money comes from the Municipality. It is in the Estimates of the Medical Officer of Health. But very often the Church, or the School, or the Community House will give us rooms free of charge, if we take good care of them and pay the extra cleaning necessary. In any case, let us hope the rent will be a nominal one, and certainly it must not be more than the average room rent of the district. In most parts of Canada the nurse should have a salary of about one hundred dollars a month, and an honorarium of two hundred dollars a year or more is often paid to the Doctor.

The next article will describe the functions and equipment of a Baby Health Centre had gained from the insurance she had held on her mother's life. Now as he minutely recalled, he had detected, too, the unconscious, unknowing sadness back of the smile, the tired lines that were drooping her forehead and the growing stoop to her shoulders. It was strange that he should be thinking of that. Then illness had come—incessant operations, and completely useless, she had had to leave after so many years. She had evidently gone to her daughter. Quite often, however, she would come over to see his mother. She had been lonely apparently, and he wondered for a second whether his mother had been lonely, too, since he had left her.

A sniffing sob repointed his attention. They were making responses from the black books. He searched out one woman who seemed to lead the rest. Her answers were quick and ready, almost chopping the minister's questions. It was her trifle perfunctory manner which suggested that she must be the minister's wife. She was helping things along amid the diffidence of those to whom grief of this sort was an occasion and not a habit.

He found himself singularly acute to all impressions. He objected to movement of any sort; the flapping of a window shade bothered him, and the regular beat of the wife's fan. The entrance of the frock-coated assistant with a thin glass tube disturbed his mood frightfully. There was apparently to be no service at the grave, for he noticed the minister sprinkling earth over the casket—he wondered where they got that earth. It floated in an irregular pool on the blackness and some irreverent flies settled to investigate. Then he observed for the first time that the casket did not have silver handles. He had always thought they all had silver handles, but these were dull, resentful, leaden strips narrow, though strong.

Near it were four pathetic masses of flowers. He counted them; his was the freshest. The others had visiting cards savagely clinging and proclaiming their sympathy. He tried to read what was written on them. Four friends who remembered and eight or nine more who were sitting listening to the service trailing off. He could not grasp the pathos of it. He suspected it was supreme pathos. This woman had touched so few in her life. And now at the end, in the little clean flat on the fifth floor she was lying amid the fragrance of four bunches of flowers. Vaguely he felt the existence of something unvoiced, something bigger than even his fine mind had grasped. But he knew his emotions were moved as they never had been before.

He had sat there for some time before he saw the service was over. The others were waiting for him to leave first. He rose and went out into the hall. They gave him his hat. He missed the flowers he had brought with him. They thanked him for coming. It was a great compliment. It was then the daughter proudly brought up her husband in whose flat he had been. He felt the fineness of the man; he started to feel he must do something for him, yet he resented just a trifle the equality with which he was greeted. Her husband did not seem to feel the difference in their stations.

As he started down the stairs he saw this last incident had suggested the answer to the old nurse's life. This was the thing for which he had been groping. He did not try to descend quickly. He was alone, too, with his thoughts. They were very sacred to him at that moment. He understood now a great many things. He saw the simple eloquence of her life. This simple woman, following no impulse but the unquestioning one of her womanhood, with everything against her, had done her part grandly in the world. She had faced all the jagged facts of life with dignity, with sweetness and with beauty. She had brought up a son to stand alone, clear-eyed and unafraid. She had raised a daughter to goodness and virtue. She had married her daughter to a man with a firm grip, a man who acknowledged no superior, who felt himself the equal of the best. There was the proof of greatness before him, the son and the daughter. They were the reason of her life,—the answer to it all. She had reached greatness higher than most men who mold events and move nations. Clearly he recalled all the silent signs of her honesty, the unconsciously spoken words of uprightness she had brought to him as he had sat in the little odd low caned chair. Yes, she had touched his life, too, she had helped in the making of a great man, she had been an influence. He would never forget her, never! He was glad he had come. And she lay upstairs with only four bunches of flowers.

He found himself seated in the machine. He saw the children scrambling to close the door. Then its slam aroused him. The chauffeur was awaiting the word. He told him to drive home. The machine jerked him away from the door, and as it passed the old florist shop with its animated mottoes and wire moulds he smiled at the old sentimentalist within who maundered in emotion. The machine seemed to be going very slowly; he leaned forward and ordered the chauffeur to hurry. He did not desire to be late. Besides since he had made up his mind to do the "thing," he wanted to get it off his mind.

August Mornings Bubble Grain Delights

Let Puffed Rice add enticement to every August breakfast. You will never find a cereal dainty half so fine as this.

These are toasted rice grains puffed to bubbles. Flimsy, flavory globules—dainty food confections. Yet they form the utmost in a rice food, for every food cell is broken.

In millions of homes this morning they added joy to breakfast. Did your folks enjoy them?

Use them like puffed nuts

Puffed Rice tastes like nut-meats puffed. Mix them with your berries to add a nut-like blend. Scatter like nut-meats on ice cream.

Mix with berries

Use in candy making. Crisp and douse with melted butter for children to eat like peanuts.

But count them foods—scientific foods. That's what they are—just whole rice grains made easy to digest. Be glad that children find them tidbits. Puffed Rice is good for them.

Puffed Rice Puffed Wheat

August Evenings Float in Bowls of Milk

Puffed wheat is whole wheat, puffed to eight times normal size. It is made by Prof. Anderson's process—shot from guns. Over 125 million steam explosions occur in every kernel—one for each food cell. Thus digestion is made easy and complete.

Whole wheat supplies 16 needed elements. Here those elements are all fitted to feed. So you get whole-wheat nutrition, and that's the ideal food.

Nothing else compares

Remember how children need whole wheat. Remember how they love it in this form. Then let them get it in abundance, as they wish.

Milk gains multiplied delights when these flaky, nut-like grains are floated in it.

See now if you have plenty on hand.

THE BINDER

I'm very busy, following your advice. The binder has come. I find it's worth protecting, so Wilkins is here with a load of wood and tin and stuff helping me fix up for it. Much love to you and our little Son.

Arthur.

It was Wednesday evening. Jean leaned back in the soft seat of the neighbour's car, her baby in her arms, Arthur, his own old self, loving and thoughtful, beside her. Young Watson was driving slowly, making an occasional detour, for the trail was bad in many places. Heavy rains had fallen in torrents for the past two days.

Night was falling as they neared home. A chilly breeze sprang up. The man drew the warm steamer rug closer about his wife.

"Slow going to-night. Roads are bad," he said.

"Yes," she answered.

She wanted to know if he had put out the tubs and buckets to catch the rain water, but that would only bring up a sorry subject, and she was loath to break the sweetness of the ride. The water problem could wait, though it would be more acute than ever now.

The car slowed to a stop.

Arthur jumped out, took the shawl wrapped bundle from his wife, helped her to the platform, lifted out the valise and spoke to young Watson.

"Thanks, Jim. Coming in?"

"Not this time. Too late. Good-night."

His 'good-night' was answered with thanks.

He turned the car around. It purred into the darkness of the prairie night.

Jean and Arthur entered the shack. She held the baby while the man struck a light and lit the lamp. He carried the valise to the bedroom. Jean laid the sleeping baby on the lounge, removed his shawl, coat and bonnet, then opened up the shawl and spread it over him. Next she took off her own coat and hat. It was good to be home. Arthur had been busy indeed. Everything was in order. Some late black-eyed Susans were in a tall yellow vase on the centre table.

The table was neatly set and a big new comfortable easy chair was drawn near it.

Jean looked at this chair in bewilderment. Her husband watched her.

"Try it," he said, putting her into it, "it's for you."

She sank into it. It was padded in brown and was soft as deep moss.

"What's it like?" he asked.

"Like Santa Claus days," she told him, "when fairies worked overnight."

He smiled broadly, as if the half had not been told, and set about lighting the fire. The wood-box was full. She watched him work. He moved the kettle to the front of the stove. He looked so young to-night and so expectant—just like a small boy who has something to tell but doesn't exactly want to tell it.

The fire crackled brightly. Jean's gaze wandered around the room. His eyes followed hers to the north corner. The bench with its water pails was gone. In its place was a shining, white enamel sink and a pump at the right side. She looked from it to her husband in utter incomprehension, then hastened over to examine and admire.

"Is it real?" she asked.

"Real as the water in it," he answered gaily. "See it come!" He pumped some into the dipper to prove his words.

"Arthur, is it magic? Where does it come from?"

"From a tank in the cellar. We've got eave troughs all around the house. You'll see them in the morning. They catch the rain that falls on the roof. We get it straight from the sky. We've got pipes to lead the water into the cellar. We've got a tank down there that holds thirty barrels-full and with those blessed rains of the last two days, the tank is nearly a third full! a third!"

He was as excited as a ten-year old.

Jean tried to grasp the ten barrels full.

"Surprised?" he asked, his arm over her shoulder.

"It's wonderful," she answered. "Oh, Arthur, everything's lovely. The sink, and the chair, and you, and home, so—so homey! What made you think of it?"

He was silent a half minute, then made slow answer, "Twas the binder-----" men Moroni and Mendez and Dupont must have thought they were) are hers. The pearls I'll keep for my father, and he can decide what he wishes to do with them. He can have the aeroplane too, if he likes. I don't want the nasty old thing any more. I've suffered too much in it—and through it. But it's mine all the same.

It woke up.

Patchinka handed her the broken rope of pearls, and the separate six which I had salvaged. The rope Wendela coolly slipped into an inside pocket of her ermine coat, as if the lovely things had been made of wax or fish-scales. The loose ones she tied up in a small, much-wept-in handkerchief, and added them to the rest.

Then we started on our walk through the heavy sand to camp.

It was a long walk but it seemed short to me, for Patchinka clung to my arm like a mid-Victorian maid, and Dubois, turning over the command of his men to a sergeant, thought it his duty to help Miss Horden. Hamada would have been a considerable detour, and we avoided it. Dubois, however, sent a man there with a message to be wired at once to Horden in Paris, that his daughter was safe. If the Bureau des Postes were closed, let it be opened! That was the way of the Legion in the desert. And it was not impossible that Monsieur Horden would receive the telegram at midnight in his hotel. On hearing this, Patchinka implored him to add a message to Miss Wellington at Cap Martin, and her request was granted.

Imagine Patchinka Kapiha and Wendela Horden sharing a tent!

Not that Patchinka mightn't at any time have consented, for she was—and is—a philosopher. But Wendela—and after the Revelation! Yet that was the plan, and she did not oppose it. Lieutenant Dubois' tent was to be made as comfortable as could be, for les deux demoiselles. We all went in together at first, however, to look at Kapiha's documents. Patchinka could wait no longer, though she knew that she would not understand their intricacies. She had, she confessed, no mind for mechanism when explained on paper, though—she added proudly—there were few machines she couldn't understand if she saw them.

Dubois would modestly have excused himself. There might be secrets which no stranger ought to share. But Patchinka insisted. "Monsieur, you are not a stranger," she said. "You are a rescuer. Is it not so, Miss Horden?"

Neither Dubois nor I were experts, but it struck us both when we'd studied the papers that Kapiha had got hold of the great thing at last—the thing which all aeroplane inventors have aimed at, the helicopter.

Even in the old Mascot Sacha's been creeping near it; but in the design before our eyes, propellers made to revolve horizontally above the machine should lift its entire weight vertically off the ground at starting point, avoiding the preliminary run of a 100 to 300 feet before sufficient speed to rise can be attained.

There was also in this new and brilliant invention the power to travel in any direction merely by changing the plane in which the propellers revolved, to one having a small angle with the horizon.

The difficulty of the helicopter screws, from which other inventors suffered, had apparently been obviated by Kapiha. Such screws, before getting up speed enough to lift their heavy load, established downward currents of air, with great velocity, in which the screws must run with lessened power. But here, these downward currents could be checked by interposing planes below, set at an angle determined by the operator. The high engine power would overcome the resistance of these extra planes, while preserving the lift of the entire weight, and altogether it looked as if the intriguing problem was solved.

A second design showed a new wing to give unprecedented speed in flight, and there were other ideas outlined not finished, still, there was enough material in that small roll to make the inventor's sister independent for life. Not that I wanted her to be independent! On the contrary. But I should have been a brute to grudge the girl her pleasure. We had succeeded—she and I together—in our mission; and I believe that fact gave her more joy than the thought of money gain.

When we parted for the night, Wendela treated me like a kind uncle. I could only hope she wasn't up to mischief. But next morning early—a rose and gold morning in the desert—Patchinka was in a position to explain Miss Horden from A to Z.

"She told me she never cared for you really," smiled my Lady from the Air. "When she first saw you at Monte Carlo she was attracted by the contrast between you and a Dutch cousin her mother wished her to marry. She'd practically run away from the Hague, and rushed off alone to the Riviera to escape him, she was so bored. She's realized now that what she felt for you was nothing but pique, because you didn't seem to care much about her. She isn't used to indifference from men, so she flirted with Dupont. Last night was the most wonderful night of her life, and she never knew truly what Romance was till Lieutenant Dubois came out of the darkness and saved her from death or worse. Those are almost her very words. And she's going to be f-fearfully nice to her father, so he will consent to her marrying Dubois, who is perhaps poor as well as proud."

"How does she know the proud Dubois wants to marry her?" I crudely asked.

"Why, you remember he walked with her all that long way last night, when you were with me: and it was the desert: and there was a moon; and it seems, my Duguesclin, that he said things." He pointed to the footprints of camels in the sand, which—we can see now—are exactly like hearts. They were full of blue shadows in the night, as if they lay under water, I noticed. But the shape showed plainly, and Dubois told Wendela that each print they came to was his heart, under her little feet.

"Her feet aren't little," I mumbled. Patchinka laughed. "Well, that is what Dubois said. And also that, if he had as many hearts as there were footprints, all would be for her to step on if she wished. Perhaps he does admire her. She's not so bad, when she doesn't sulk! Anyhow, she will be very rich; and as for him, all Legionnaires are brave, men and officers too. She will lead her father a life if he refuses! And why should he?"

"Why indeed?" I echoed. "Anything to get rid of Wendela, I should think."

"Ungrateful, after the way she behaved last night."

"By Jove, so I am! I'd forgotten. But how can I help forgetting everything about her when I'm with you?"

Evidently Horden had got the telegram at midnight, for we had an answer that morning: we, I say, for the message was for us all. Henry Horden was glad we were safe. He had got the government to spare him some "essence" in the special circumstances; and having now completed his big deal in aeroplanes, would fly at once to Monte Carlo where he hoped we would return and meet him immediately.

I feared that we should have to remain in Algeria and bear witness against the Syndicate and Gauthier. But the Commander of the Legion desert expedition smiled and shrugged. "It would be too bad to disappoint so important a man, who has just put millions of francs into France's pocket," said he. "French law acts in Monte Carlo, as in Algeria. The plot, you tell me, was hatched in Monaco. The men shall be sent there for trial. They will travel in a small ship, and if they are seaisick, none of us will grieve."

So we obeyed Horden's command; and this time Wendela was our only passenger on the Mascot—unless you count Petro. The girl seemed astonished that Dubois could not get leave at a moment's notice and fly with us to her father. But then, the Legion's discipline is part of its romance—at all events, to sentimental girls.

At blazing noon we left the desert; and having no "Pearl" (or other) trouble this time, we reached Monte Carlo before sunset. It's trite to say that an aeroplane "annihilates distance;" but it did seem wonderful to be back again after all we had gone through, to find people doing just the same thing as when we'd seen them pottering about yesterday in the Place du Casino.

Henry S. had already arrived, and to our surprise was awaiting us down by the harbour, at my hangar. Still more strange, the Iron Duke was with him. But after she had wept a little with joy she explained that her presence there wasn't strange at all. She had been at the hangar the whole afternoon, just hoping, not expecting. And Mr. Horden had enquired where the place was, when he drove into Monte from Nice. It was at Nice that he had landed after the flight from Paris, and there he had with difficulty secured a horse-cab for the price of an automobile.

"Well, what's going to be done about this air-plane, daughter?" Horden asked when everyone had told him everything—except about Dubois.

"I might give it to Boy—I mean, Captain Malet," said Wendela. "It just depends—on you."

"On me, eh?"

"Yes, poppa. I'll tell you presently. But first, how about these pearls. Are you really going to give them to Momma?"

"Not me. Nope. She might come back to me if I did. And I guess we both get on better apart. She writes such nice letters from the Hague, I'd quite miss 'em. I expect you'll have the pearls, as you've got your claws on 'em. But—"

"But what?" Wendela wanted to know. "Well, they were Miss Kapiha's, not her brother's, and—"

"I suppose you'd like me to give the rope to her for a wedding gift when she marries Captain Malet. I'll do that, poppa, and make the plane over to him, if you'll give me a present."

"What present?"

"The only one I've ever really wanted; liberty to marry the man I love."

Then it all came out. Patchinka and I both praised Dubois; and Horden said "Yes" almost as quickly as I'd imagined he would whether or not for the same motive, who knows?

The two went to the post office to wire the little lieutenant, and Patchinka, the Duke and I had a wonderful talk in the old hangar, with Petro at our feet.

"We are so happy!" cried the girl, "so happy; but you are not surprised, Duke. You knew from the first, I'm sure—though you said nothing. You are too discreet to speak on such a subject, but you are a darling! I won't tease you. Oh, and you are to be happy too, all your life. You shall never go back to the Bournemouth shop. We'll see to that—Duguesclin and I! As for poor dear Laurette, we'll take her to Paris by and by. She'll be safe travelling under Mr. Horden's protection—and soon she'll free herself from the hateful Marquis de Fiumine—free herself, to dream always of Sacha without shame."

"Come along, folks," Horden's nice voice broke in on us suddenly, while Wendela hung on his arm, all smiles. "We're going to have dinner together, just as we are, out on the terrace at Ciro's. And do you know what we'll begin with, Miss Kapiha?"

She shook her head. "Caviare! If it hadn't been for caviare—and me—you and your young man wouldn't have been where you are now."

My Lady from the Air looked at me.

"Oh, but nothing could have kept us apart," she said.

This laboratory test shows how the Royal removes the EMBEDDED dirt, as well as the SURFACE litter

Notice that the Royal not only picks up all SURFACE DIRT but it removes all of the EMBEDDED DIRT

This dirt harms your rugs most

Let the Royal Man show you how you can remove it—thoroughly, easily

THE dirt that harms your rugs most is not the surface dirt, such as lint, hair, threads and light dust. It is the gritty, embedded dirt that has worked down into the fabric of your rugs and is gradually cutting the fibre with millions of sharp little points and edges. The laboratory jar-of-water test shows how much of this dirt there is as compared with the surface litter.

And this dirt, the embedded dirt, is unsanitary and germ-breeding. Truly, the worst dirt is in your rugs—not on them.

How scientific Royal air suction removes this dirt

To get out all of this dirt a cleaner must do three things. It must produce a powerful suction. This suction must be uniform all along the nozzle. And the nozzle must be adjusted "directly" to the rug surface.

The Royal does these three things. Its suction is not only powerful but actually increases slightly in use. Scientific and patented design creates a uniform suction along the entire 14-inch nozzle length. And with the patented Royal adjustment screw, the powerful, uniform suction is applied "directly" to the rug surface.

From a "clean" Wilton—a pint of dirt in 5 minutes

Mrs. P. J. Smith, 307 Salem Avenue, Toronto, had an 8 by 10 Wilton rug. It had been thoroughly beaten and swept the day previous to the Royal Man's call, and Mrs. Smith naturally thought it was clean.

But in exactly 5 minutes, the Royal extracted from this "clean" Wilton one pint of dirt! And practically all of it was embedded dirt that Royal's powerful suction, scientifically applied, removed after violent beating and sweeping had failed.

So thorough is the Royal's powerful suction—yet so gentle that it positively cannot harm the finest rug or sheerest drape. The Royal is gentle because it cleans by air alone. You can use it safely every day.

Easy to use—and clean in use

The Royal is so light, and it requires so few strokes over the rug (because it cleans so fast) that it will never tire you. The trigger-switch on the handle saves stooping to turn on the current, and the Royal nozzle is designed to get into corners and under furniture easily.

When you have finished cleaning your rug with the Royal, all the dirt is inside the bag; all parts of the cleaner, inside and out, are clean and your hands are unsoiled. There is no dirt to drop back on the floor.

Trouble-proof and built to last a lifetime

With such mechanical simplicity and precision is the Royal built that it is practically trouble-proof. And so sturdily is it constructed that it will serve you many years. The Royal is made to last a lifetime. Throughout the country it is known to dealers and users for its long life and faithful service.

Let the Royal Man show you

We suggest that you arrange with the Royal Man to clean a rug in your home—without obligation to you. He will also show you how to clean from cellar to garret—how to clean concrete, hardwood and linoleum floors; how to renovate mattresses and pillows; how to remove the dirt from upholstered furniture or hangings; and how to clean in and around fireplaces, registers, radiators, etc.

Don't be content with getting only the surface dirt! The most dirt and the really harmful dirt is in the fabric, not on the surface.

PRICE TWENTY CENTS

Moments Which Count

WHEN you are conscious of the scrutiny of interested eyes which appraise every detail of your appearance, can you sit serene, secure in the consciousness that there is nothing to criticise but everything to admire?

Happy is the girl who can answer "yes" in these all important moments. She is the girl who knows that her fresh, clear skin and smooth, white neck and arms are sure to command admiration.

The girl who is not so sure of her personal attractiveness, who is conscious that complexion defects may affect her popularity, should waste no time remedying these conditions. The secret is cosmetic cleanliness, which keeps the skin free from clogging accumulations.

Once a day, do this

Once a day, preferably at bedtime, give your face a thorough cleansing. This doesn't mean a harsh, irritating scrub, but a cosmetic cleansing accomplished by the gentlest possible means. Soap is necessary, but only the mildest soap should be used. This is Palmolive, blended from palm and olive oils.

Once you experience the mild, soothing effect of its smooth, creamy lather you will recognize daily cleansing as the surest complexion beautifier.

Removal, once a day, of the accumulations of dirt, oil, perspiration and the remaining traces of cold cream and powder is absolutely essential to a clear, fresh skin.

Neglect results in clogged pores, coarse texture and blackheads. When the accumulated soil carries infection, pimples are the result.

An ancient secret

The value of beautifying cleansing was discovered long ago, in the days of ancient Egypt. It was Cleopatra's secret—whatever the embellishments she employed, they were applied after the daily bath with palm and olive oils as cleansers.

The great queen was famous for her beauty long after early youth was passed. She kept her looks with the aid of the same gentle, stimulating cleansing which we recommend today.

Blended from the same oils

Palmolive is blended from the same costly oriental oils which served Cleopatra as cleanser and beautifier. We import them from overseas in vast quantity to keep the Palmolive factories at work day and night. This is necessary to supply the world-wide demand.

This popularity has reduced price, as manufacturing volume permits economies which lower production costs. Thus we are able to supply Palmolive for only 10 cents a cake.

So while Palmolive ranks first as finest facial soap, you can afford to follow Cleopatra's example and use it for bathing.

Complexion beauty does not end with the face. Beautify your body with Palmolive.

THERE used to be a prejudice against women's organizations, arising, no doubt, from the fear that club duties would interfere with the fulfilment of women's domestic obligations. However, the association of women members continued to flourish and now Canada possesses a variety of feminine organizations in keeping with her multi-form activities. The earliest of these associations were the sewing circle, the missionary society and the literary club. Then came the card club, the travel club and the civic club. The women's missionary societies in the various churches have grown with amazing rapidity and now handle hundreds of thousands of dollars annually, with an efficiency which would have astonished our great-grandfathers. The old-time sewing circle has not been abandoned and its uses are always of fundamental importance, even where machinery has accomplished much of the work formerly done by women's busy fingers. There are several nationally organized women's associations in Canada. The largest of these is the Federated Women's Institutes of which Mrs. William Todd, of Orillia, is president. This remarkable society had its origin at Stoney Creek, Ontario, and is of the utmost importance in the development of our Dominion. "For Home and Country" is its motto, to which it has been faithful through many trying years.

Then we have a large and imposing organization in the Imperial Order, Daughters of the Empire, which had its origin in Montreal, but which has had a head office in Toronto for some years. The I. O. D. E., as it is now familiarly called, is essentially patriotic and endeavors to carry out the ideals of the dual loyalty of the Canadian—to the Old Land and the New. Founded during the latter days of the Boer War, the I. O. D. E. owed its original impulse to the desire to make closer the ties which unite Canada with the British Isles, also with the other nations within the Empire. For more than a score of years, the I. O. D. E. has broadened and strengthened, until today it has a membership of over fifty thousand in the Dominion and has been extended beyond our borders. In the United States, it is known as the I. O. D. B. E.—and the West Indies also became enthusiastic some years ago over the formation of chapters in those Islands where so many citizens from various lands find a winter paradise.

The war work of the I. O. D. E. fills a large volume in the mere chronicle. Just let us point out here that the war proved triumphantly the value of organization. However enthusiastic and industrious individuals may be, help, to be nationally effective, must be organized and disciplined. When our nation's time of testing came, eight years ago, it found the women, as well as the men, ready to help—and no regiment ever responded more loyally to the call of a leader than our women's organizations to the appeals which poured in for aid and re-inforcement. The Red Cross Society can tell, in words with world-wide echoes, of the assistance promptly and readily given by the women's organizations of Canada. Among these, the I. O. D. E. proved more than eager to take a heavy share. Again and again the I. O. D. E. chapter in a far settlement was the center for organized war work. The story of those years is told, and the members of this organization are now devoting their energies to helpful reconstruction work, especially in the department of education.

The work of the chapters of the I. O. D. E. differs in the various provinces, according to the local needs. While the underlying purpose of the Order is patriotic, the term is interpreted with a liberality which embraces many projects. The fight against the White Plague for instance, is a cause which has enlisted the sympathies of many chapters, as it means so much to the life and health of the community. In various cities, there have been established hospitals for the special treatment of this disease, which has so long menaced our civilization.

The I. O. D. E. has been fortunate in its officers. The founder, Mrs. Clark Murray, has lived to see the organization which she knew in its infancy, grow into a vigorous and constructive maturity. For many years, Mrs. Nordheimer, of Toronto, was president of the Order, and was succeeded in office by Mrs. Gooderham, also a Torontonian. Mrs. John Bruce and Miss Joan Arnoldi were successive presidents, and this year, Mrs. P. E. Doolittle, of Toronto, was elected to the office.

There are many problems to be solved in this after-the-war Canada—and such organizations as the Women's Institute and the I. O. D. E. will do much towards the settlement of many troubling questions. The old-time prejudice against clubs and associations has almost disappeared, for the clubs have abundantly proved their usefulness. After all, should any of the dismal prophets be believed when they tell us that associations, clubs, or "aids" will make any woman neglectful of the home? On the contrary, the first object of a woman's organization is to better the condition of the homes, especially the lot of the children. Men need not worry about political life making woman indifferent to domestic needs. Whatever be her political creed in the matter of free trade or high tariff, woman will always be a "protectionist" where childhood is concerned. Hence, her club for patriotic or civic purpose means safer and happier lives for Young Canada.

The memorial scholarships, awarded by the I. O. D. E. to the children of soldiers, sailors or aviators who gave their lives in the Great War have already proved an incentive to ambitious young students in our various provinces. What better memorial could there be for the men, who made the Great Sacrifice, that honor and freedom might live, than this flinging open the gate of opportunity to the young Canadians who are eager for thorough training and higher culture? The best equipment is none too good for those who are to be leaders in Canada—and surely, we may look for some of our prominent men and women among the children of the men who were ready and eager to defend the Empire's cause.

The aims of the I. O. D. E. are such as appeal to all classes of the community, and the need for co-operation to-day among our loyal women is as great as it was in the years of war. May the efforts of the Order be towards unity and strength.

The growth of women's organizations in Canada has been, in the main, of a healthy and helpful nature. The "drop of Scotch" in the Canadian nationality will always make for progress flavored with caution. The Canadian woman is not easily "rushed" into a cause or a calling, but she is likely to remain with either an organization or an institution which she has chosen. There is hard work to be done in our Dominion during the coming years, but our modern women's clubs have the pioneer spirit.

Mrs. P. E. Doolittle, of Toronto, is the recently-elected National President of the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire.

A TALE OF THE CARIBOO

BY WALTER EDWARDS

Illustrated by Arthur Drummond

"BIG Gab" Billings was on his way out.

There are few of you who can know what this means unless you are one of those who were in the Cariboo in the days of the rush in the Sixties. Those days when ten thousand men had made their way over old Indian trails, and up the roaring rivers, to search for gold in the creeks, and hills, and valleys; following the Float ever on and on till their food and their hope were gone. All manner of men—clerks, and professional men; sailors and soldiers and miners; but only one kind of women. And all burning with the same fever.

At first the gold had been found in the form of dust in the sand bars of the Fraser, and after these had been washed out the mob had pushed its way farther and farther North. At Williams Creek it had been found in dust and nuggets and as much as forty pounds had been taken out of that creek in a single day. And Antler Creek had yielded three hundred thousand dollars in three weeks. And then gradually the search had extended North and East and Quesnell had been founded; and Barkerville. Where there had been no signs of dust or nuggets men had followed the "Float;" those pieces of rock showing signs of metal, which break from some gold bearing ledge and are washed down with the current far from their source.

On and on they had followed the lure of adventure and gain until they were spent and broken and seized with despondency, despair, and bitterness. Despondency that sapped the vitals of strong men till they sat for days on a bench in the sun, waiting; waiting; waiting—for nothing; and a despair born of this despondency for they knew that they were waiting in vain; knew in fact that they were not waiting for anything; that they had abandoned hope, and that they would give up at last when their stake was gone and "Go out." Go with a bitterness against the Cariboo, and their country; yes and even against their fellow man—and God.

Billings was an "Overlander" which is to say, that he was one of those who had come overland from the East by ox-cart, by canoe, by raft, and on foot three thousand miles across country that was then a dangerous wilderness, to the great Cariboo where it had been said men could find nuggets by the roadside. They called him "Gab" because his initials were G.A.B. and because he was a man of few words.

He had waded hip deep through sloughs and muskeg, and swum in the icy rapids of the rivers; he had crossed great chasms hand over hand on a fallen sapling where a slip meant instant death; he had gone for days with nothing to eat but bark and roots, and had seen men drop out to die by the way, and men drowned in the hungry canyons where the swirling waters seemed to be roaring for their prey. He had been one of the party to discover that island where the mutilated and torn bodies of all but one of the stranded party had told its own tale of savagery and man's inherent will to live, even by means too ghastly to mention. And when he reached Quesnell and they asked if he had had many adventures on the trip he merely said "Yes, some. Where can I get an outfit?" So they called him Gab.

And now he was on his way out.

The Cariboo had taken his all and had given him in return,—nothing. He had laid his means, and his hopes; his enthusiasm and his strength, at the feet of the Yellow God and it had accepted them placidly as its due, and had returned no sign that it accepted him as one of its elect.

He had tried the sand, and the gravel, and the clay: he had followed the float far, and now he was "going out" broke and despondent.

He and Shorty McLeod had mushed far South. They had passed Williams Creek, and Antler Creek, now deserted save for the occasional solitary miner sticking doggedly to his claim, and digging and washing, and looking with fresh eagerness into every pan for the signs that might mean wealth even beyond his dreams.

"Can we make it Shorty?" he asked one morning as they were breaking camp.

"Just," said Shorty. "We got enough grub to last us if we don't lose no time on the way. And a good thing too," he added, "for, I tell you Gab, I ain't feelin' none too good."

"Well," said Billings, "Let's mush. I didn't come overland to quit on the way out."

"No more did them others which quit on the way in," said Shorty, succinctly, and they shouldered their packs and tramped on. About noon they came to the bed of a small creek, now dry, and halted for a rest and a bite.

"Sit down Shorty," said Billings, "I'll get some wood and make you some coffee. You look bad."

Shorty stretched himself out wearily. "I tell you Gab," he said again, "I ain't feelin' none too good."

Billings walked up the creek bed gathering bits of wood and brush from the dry bottom, for this was the dry belt and there were no trees. Suddenly he uttered an exclamation as his foot turned over a rock. "Shorty," he yelled, "here's some float. Damned good float too," he added.

"To Hell with it!" said the little man listlessly. "I've follered float too long."

PUSHING on in his search for fuel Billings turned up more float, and then more, and having gathered enough fuel for a fire he returned and set the water to boil for the coffee. While it was heating he produced his find.

"Looks good," he said.

"It always does," said Shorty, "but we ain't got no time to foller it. We kin just make it as it is, and" he added petulantly, "I ain't feelin' good I tells yer."

"Let's try once more," Billings urged. "A man can't go out while there's a chance. We won't take more than a day to it, and if nothing turns up we'll quit."

"Fer God's sake, Gab!" cried Shorty, "Let's go on. I can't no more than make it as it is. One extra day will fix me good. Oh! Gab," he whined piteously as he saw the fever of hope again burning in his partner's eyes, "don't do it. How many times have yer follered float before. And all this was washed and prospected most thorough by all them fellers on the way in. I tells yer, one extry day will fix me good and plenty. It'll take two days now to the Head of The Road and the grub won't no more than hold out. I couldn't last no longer."

"I hate to leave you, Shorty, but I'm going to give her one more chance," Billings replied. "You take the grub in case you can't make it in the two days. I'll meet you at the Head of The Road. There's lots of work on the road and we can earn enough to make Victoria."

Without waiting for any further protest, or any thanks from Shorty for his share of the grub, he shouldered his pack and strode up the creek bed.

For the remainder of that day, and a part of the next, he followed the float up the creek bottom, but it had seemed to end in a place where there was nothing whatever to indicate the direction from which it had come into the creek. The rest of the second day he had spent in feverishly searching about the open country for signs of the float, but without success, and now darkness was coming on, and he began to feel great drops of rain against his face.

Nowhere does it rain with greater violence than in the dry belt. It seems as though all the water stored for months in the clouds were let loose to be returned to the earth in the one precipitation, and where an hour before everything had been dry and parched, little brooks run in every direction, and the ground is like a sponge.

It was thirty hours since he had eaten, and about fifteen since he had even rested, so relentlessly had the hope of this last chance lured him on. The cold rain felt good against his burning skin, but as it settled down to a steady pour Billings realized that he must find a shelter of some kind, for his prospector's experience warned him that unless he could keep dry the morning would find him in a fever that would prevent his moving.

"I give in," he said to himself. "I was a fool to try it again, and Shorty was right. To-morrow I will go out."

He set about finding some place to shelter from the rain, but the bare rolling country with its interminable sage brush and bunch grass seemed to mock him in his search, and above him a martin whistled shrilly as though in derision. Looking up he saw the martin perched on a ledge, over which the rocks projected sufficiently to protect it from the rain. It seemed inaccessible except by a rock slide which sloped down steeply from the edge of the cliff; such a slide as he knew from experience was even more treacherous than it looked, for one loosened rock might send the whole mass in a torrent tumbling down the slope, carrying with it among its jagged edges and sharp pointed splinters the thing that had set it moving, but the necessity of sleeping dry for the night determined him to try it.

Carefully feeling every rock before bringing any pressure to bear upon it he made his way, foot by foot, up the slope. The rough rocks cut his hands and tore his clothes, but he struggled on and up, his trembling legs hardly able to push him forward, until at last he gained the edge. The martin whistled and scurried away but it was now too dark to see it, and crawling on hands and knees he crept under the ledge.

WHEN Gab Billings woke next morning the sun was shining brightly over the hills and he knew that he should be moving, but he was dazed and dizzy from hunger and fatigue, and sore from his contact with the rocks, and the desire even to live seemed to have deserted him.

"What does it matter?" he thought. "I could never make it to the Head of The Road. I might as well die here as on the trail."

He rolled over to shut out the sight of the sun, and the World, for he was sick of a World that promised so much and gave nothing, and then he lay still—for sparkling back at him from the rock was the golden light he had come so far to find. He did not move: he hardly dared to breathe. Then it occurred to him that he might be delirious from exhaustion and hunger. Stories had been told him of men who had finally gone mad and in their madness had seen rich veins, and veins of pure gold, from which only force by their rescuers could tear them.

The thought sent a shudder through his mighty frame and made him sit up. He felt his forehead and found it not exceptionally fevered. Then he looked at his hands and his gun, and out across the valley to try if he could see clearly. Again he turned toward the golden treasure and for a long time stared at it dully; then cautiously he began to approach it, like a panther creeping upon its prey. Slowly he opened his knife and crept forward until he was within reaching distance, and then he halted again. He feared to try the reality for if it were a dream he wanted to enjoy it to the full before he woke. Slowly he put out his hand and touched the rock, and then he sprang up with a wild shriek and began feverishly to pick at the golden particles with his knife.

"Gold!" he yelled. "Gold! Oh God!" He pressed his face and his body against the rock with his arms outspread as though he would embrace it all, and so fell exhausted to the ground.

After the first excitement was over his nature reasserted itself: the nature that had brought him safely overland to the Cariboo and had earned him the soubriquet of "Gab," and he set about staking out his claim. In the course of this work he managed to shoot a fool hen which he devoured ravenously, and drank deep of the clear pools left by the rain in the hollows of rocks. He found too that the ledge led out onto the face of the hill from whence he could get back to the lower ground without retracing his way over the rock slide.

Hurrying now over the ground he had covered in the previous days when his time had been taken up in the search for float, he reached the place where he had left Shorty, some time before sundown. A white paper waving on a stick attracted his attention, and he found it to be a note.

"Dear Gab" it read "I have left yur shar of the grub buried under this stick. Good luck and good by I ain't feelin none to good. Shorty."

Having eaten some of the food and taken some rest he set out again, for he realized from the "Good Bye" in Shorty's note that he must be nearly all in. The repetition of the phrase "I ain't feelin' none too good" he knew to

He found Shorty lying under a sage bush. He was unconscious, but still breathing.

PROLOGUE

"No man is hero to his valet," so runs the cynical adage. But you can reverse the saying with reference to the other sex. Every woman is a heroine to her lady's maid; it may not be true in all cases, but 'tis true enough for any proverb.

The romance of a lady's own woman is centred in her mistress. She will clothe her in finery with a greater joy than if she were draping herself; rather than see her go shabby she would wear sackcloth; she will hang over the banisters, on a dinner-party night, to observe the sit of her train as she sweeps downstairs on the arm of some notable personage; she will lean out of the window to watch her step into her sedan, and if there are Beaux hovering and my Lady tosses her plumes and whisks her panniers to proper advantage it is Abigail's heart that beats high with pride.

Even Miss Lydia Pounce, own woman to my Lady Kilcroney, a damsel remarkable from her earliest youth for her tart and contradictory ways, who was verging on elderliness now with the acidity and leanness peculiar to the "born old maid," would have laid down her life to ensure that my Lady's court gown should fit her trim waist without a wrinkle, or that the pink silk stocking that clothed her pretty leg was drawn to its proper skintight limit.

(Both the Incomparable Kitty and her Lydia were exceedingly particular that these same stockings should never be worn with the gross slovenliness that permitted a sag. Not indeed that anything but the merest glimpse of slender, arched feet, like the "little mice" of an earlier poet's fancy, peeping in and out from under the flutter and foam of lace and silken flounce, was ever displayed to the vulgar eye; but to know these niceties complete in the smallest and most delicate detail was necessary to the comfort of any self-respecting Woman. And on this point Lydia was in thorough sympathy with her mistress, as upon all others connected with the elegance and bon ton of the most modish of Mayfair belles; of that leader of Fashion, Feeling and Style which the Lady Kilcroney undoubtedly was.)

If Woman be a heroine to her lady's maid, in what light does she appear to her Milliner?

Here we come upon debatable ground. At first sight it would seem that the milliner, being dependent upon her customers for her very existence, it must follow that whatever her private opinion may be with regard to their appearance and taste, she can have but one burning desire: to please her patronesses. There is nevertheless another side to the question.

What Woman of intelligence but does not realise that a Mode may make or mar her? How much may hang on the droop of a feather; the tilt of a hat-brim; the glow of a rose in cunning juxtaposition with the soft carmine of a blushing cheek? Blue eyes may flash into sudden significance under a knot of azure ribbon, that had before languished their tenderest in vain. Saucy innocence may triumph beneath a shepherdess wreath; or tired charms kindle into new brilliancy stimulated by the conscious, ness of the perfect inspiration. In fine—all that life holds best is at the mercy of the mantua maker where the Lady of Fashion is concerned. Let but a clever business woman grasp this great and awful truth; and she who combines the brain that can devise, the taste that never fails, the acumen that knows no hesitation, the finger that is at once light and firm, unerring and ethereal, becomes to her employers a treasure beyond the mines of Golconda!

Such a treasure did Miss Pamela Pounce, with whom these pages are concerned, prove herself to the noted Madame Mirabel of Bond Street. And such an influence, far-reaching and subtle, did she exercise on the lives of the Elégantes who consulted her, with the eager submission and reverence of the believing Greek for his Oracles, though with far other and comfortably practical results!

Miss Pamela Pounce, Goddess of Modes, was ipso facto Goddess of the Machine of Life, deciding, with a lucky toss of ribbons or hitherto undreamt of combination of fallals, the fate of her fair customers, and incidentally that of their Beaux, their lovers and their husbands; my Lady Kilcroney and her lazy, jolly life-loving Lord; dark-browed Susan Verney, who would fain have bent the whole world to her sway as she did her weary Baron; Lady Anne, her sister, still fondly, foolishly in love with her stalwart, countrified Squire, Philip Day; their young sister, the last of the fair Vereker Ladies and the naughtiest, with her tangled love-stories; Mr. Stafford, the once famous Beau, proud of the startling beauty of his excellent, dull, childish wife, and anxious that she should flaunt it à la mode with the best of them; Sir Jasper Standish, the sporting Baronet, who, bereaved of his exquisite, clinging Julia, found himself entangled beyond belief with Miss Pamela Pounce's ribbons; the noted young actress, Miss Falcon, known as "Fair Fatality," whose brief life drama was more tragic than any she had enacted for the benefit of the public; the plain Miss Vibart, who found beauty and love and happiness all in a Pounce bandbox; Mistress Molly Lafone, own sister—who would believe it?—to the pearl of ingenuous womanhood, Prue Stafford, Molly Lafone that mix, whom the members of my Lady Kilcroney's coterie were so unanimously leagued to suppress and exclude, and who, in spite of their efforts contrived to insinuate herself disastrously into all their combinations (was it not under a wreath twisted by Pamela's long clever fingers that this elegant little adventuress came to her most deserved catastrophe?)—there was not one of them but came under her wand!

But at the same time the arbiter of the fate of others, in the shape of a very young woman, guided the shuttle of her own destiny, and wove a remarkably pretty design for herself.

Milliners, unlike Oracles and Sybils, have each their personal human span with its joys and fears, pleasures, pains and triumphs. Pamela's romance ran like a cherry-coloured thread through the warp and woof of those other existences, so far above her, in which her profession had involved her. To show the whole pattern, light and dark, sparkling and deep-hued, flowered, dotted, arabesqued, of this brocade of earthly life, the poor Modiste must assume as important a place as that of her clientele

CHAPTER I

HOW MY LADY KILCRONEY ENTERED INTO ROYAL SERVICE UNDER THE SHADOW OF THE ITALIAN HAT TRIMMED BY MISS PAMELA POUNCE

WHILE Miss Pamela Pounce was serving her third year as apprentice to the great art of Hat Confectionery, under the ægis of no less a personage than the world-famous Madame Eglantine of Paris—once "the little French Milliner" of Bath—her aunt and benefactress, who had placed her in these favourable circumstances, had begun to taste the proudest triumph of her life.

Miss Lydia Pounce was about to become own woman to a Court lady! My Lady Kilcroney—to whom she had so faithfully and ruthlessly devoted herself—from the days when, as the Widow Bellairs, she first scintillated in the world of fashion, to her present position of Viscountess—was chosen by Her Majesty, Queen Charlotte, to fill the post of Lady-in-Waiting to her own Sacred Person.

To enter Court circles had been the dream of Lydia's angular and ambitious breast. Her mistress's gratified vanity was a trifling emotion compared to the bursting satisfaction which this upward step on the social ladder afforded the maid. It is not too much to say that she regarded herself in the light of a Prime Minister who has successfully brought about some great political event, and who is a far more important person than the Sovereign whom he serves.

It came to pass in this wise. His Most Gracious Majesty, King George III, had been ordered to Cheltenham Spa for the waters by his physicians; his state of health was causing anxiety, the extent of which was as yet quite unknown to the bulk of his loyal subjects. Queen Charlotte, the most devoted of spouses, of course determined to accompany him; and the Royal party duly proceeded to the Spa.

It happened to be Lady Flora Dare Stamer's term of attendance on Her Majesty, and that stout estimable Lady-in-Waiting happened to be Lady Kilcroney's very close and dear friend. There was nothing remarkable, perhaps, in the conjunction of these two happenings; but it was indeed singular that Kitty Kilcroney should happen to discover a delicacy in her son and heir which necessitated an instant visit to the celebrated health resort now so vastly honoured.

These events having succeeded each other, nothing more natural than that my Lady Kilcroney should invite her "poor dear Flo" to a "dish of tea and a chat at her lodgings, to rest her of the fatigue consequent upon her eminent but exhausting office.

Though Lady Flora had made no secret to her intimates of her intention to rid herself of her honours as soon as might be, who so surprised as her dearest Kitty to learn that she now believed her emancipation at hand?

"To tell you the truth, my dear," said Lady Flo, chewing a macaroon, "it's not a job that suits me in the least. 'Twould fit you vastly better."

"O, Lady Flo!" cried Kitty in accents of amazement. "What a strange thought!

I vow and declare such an idea never crossed my mind. And, in truth, 'tis rank impossible. There are a hundred reasons, a thousand reasons, why I am the last person likely to be selected by Her Majesty. I am too young."

"Upon my word," said her companion bluntly. "I doubt if there's so much between us, my dear, were it not that I have run to fat. These macaroons are excellent. 'Tis like your genius to be so well served in lodgings. You've brought the best of your staff with you, I make no doubt."

"And, O, my love! the difficulty of housing them! There's scarce a tradesman in the town that hath not a servant of mine."

Kitty spoke with the careless self-importance of the wealthy woman. And Lady Florence approved.

"How right of you, my love, to insist on Comfort!" Comfort was the first and last of her aspirations. "Aye, I will have a little more cream. This whipped stuff—I dare swear 'tis your idea to have it so lavishly flavoured with the vanilla; vastly delicate. Your chocolate is as incomparable as your agreeable self! But yours are not the years of giddiness. I speak in all friendship, I beg you to believe."

Kitty murmured in an absent voice, that she had married her first—worthy Bellairs—a mere child, practically out of the nursery.

"Anyhow, my sweet Kilcroney, no woman who has had two husbands can deny a certain amount of experience, and upon rep," with a rolling laugh, "I don't care who knows that I'm on the wrong side of thirty! You must be pretty well advanced on the right side of it?"

"If you can call twenty-eight——"

"Admit to twenty-eight, by all means!—nevertheless, 'tis an age of discretion. And Her Majesty——"

"I understand——" said Kitty, balancing her teaspoon on the rim of her handleless cup with a musing air—she wondered in her soul if the excellent Lady Flo could really be taken in by this pretence; if it were possible she did not guess that she, Kitty Kilcroney, was longing, grilling to step into her Court shoes—as if she cared who knew that she was over thirty her last birthday, and warning but to ripen beauty as the months slipped by!

"'Tis not," she said aloud, with a pout, "that I would decline a post about our gracious Queen, if 'twere offered me, God forbid! I am too loyal a subject. But I understand the German woman, that frumpish creature, the Keeper of the Robes—what's her barbarous name?—hath the royal ear, and will not suffer anything young or comely, if she can help it, about Her Majesty—(And there's one for you, my Lady Flo, with your right and your wrong side of thirty!) 'Tis a vast of pity you will not continue to occupy a position so honourable and so becoming to you."

"To tell you the truth," said Lady Flora unmoved, helping herself to another macaroon, "'tis the standing that undoes your poor friend! Conceive it, my love, full fourteen stone, and on my feet hours every day. Hours did I say? Centuries. Look hither!" She thrust out a large sandalled foot, which certainly had a plethora appearance. "'Tis swollen beyond belief. I acknowledge my stoutness

I made but little count of it, for I've been a prodigious comfortable woman along of it. 'Tis a cushioned life. It pads the mind as it were. I assure you, I believe myself to have been, only some three months ago, the most good-tempered woman in England. And now! 'Pon rep, I am growing peevish! Fie upon it—stout and peevish! Was there ever such a combination?"

As if to contradict her own statement she again gave way to her jolly laugh. Kitty, watching her through long eyelashes, sighed.

"But what can induce you to think of me, my Lady Flo? Poor little retiring me!"

"Pray my dear, do not play the Molly Lafone with me!"

Molly Lafone! Such a comparison was too comic! Kitty laughed, and dropped her not very successful mask.

"Upon my word, then, I believe it would suit me! But how can it be accomplished? I am not one to push myself forward. My Lord Kilcroney is an Irishman and no courtier, and their Majesties have their own favourites; and indeed to begin with, I doubt whether you will find it so easy to resign."

"Resign, Kitty! Resign? No, dear Kilcroney, I am on the point of being graciously dismissed. It took some management, but I was desperate. Another month of this, I said, and Mr. Stamer will be able to look out for a new wife—which he would do, my dear love, across my very coffin—'twas yesterday sennight then, I made up my mind. I took my best rose-point flounce—by the mercy of heaven it was just returned from the lacemenders, neatly packed in tissue tied with ribbon and a scent bag within, as elegant a parcel as you could wish to see!—and I sought Mrs. Schwellenberg—aye, that same!—and says I, 'For mercy's sake, give me a chair. My poor feet will scarce support me?' At which she looks as sour as a crab, and quoth she: 'We all have veet, Lady Florence' (you know her vile accent), 'but we forget dem in our great honour and privilege.' 'Would God I could forget mine,' thinks I. But she glances at the parcel in my hand: 'Take a zeat,' she says with a roll of her old eye. 'Ah, my good Frau,' says I to myself, 'you may look, but you shan't clutch yet a bit!'

Lady Florence laughed reminiscently, and Kitty screamed:

"Never tell me you gave the Old Dutch villain your rose point flounce!"

"And what would be the good of a rose-point flounce to me, when I should be dropped dead in the Queen's apartment, like any hackney jade? My love, I showed that ancient toad my two feet—and I vow toad is a good name for her, for she hath the countenance and the croak of her own pet frogs—I showed her my feet, and I lamented my stones of weight. 'Pon rep! I gave myself sixteen, I did indeed, and what with the swelling, I looked 'em! 'Let me confide in you, I cries, 'if ever I saw a truly noble soul writ on a human brow, 'tis on yours! My frame,' I cries, 'is not equal to my devotion. My ankles will not support the loyalty of my heart! 'tis not that I should grudge passing away in such service,' I cries, turning up my eyes—You could not have done it better, Kitty!—but were I to faint in those sacred precincts, were I to pass away in that august Presence, Her Majesty would be justly annoyed. Dr. Jebb has warned me. Alas! look at me. Am I not fat?' 'Vat you are,' says she, 'but so am I.' Well, then, my love, I gave her a peep of the lace, and she began to dribble at the corners of her mouth, and I knew the trick was done! 'If I speak to Her Majesty,' says she, and she fingering my rose-point, 'I vonder vot substitute I could suggest. Her Majesty she does not like the changes, and—' And then, I thought of you, Kitty."

"I wonder why, in the name of Heaven!" cried this lady tartly.

"Your feet won't swell, my love."

"I need not accept," quoth Kitty, pinching her lips.

"Kitty, if you play your cards well, the post will be offered to you while their Majesties are here at Cheltenham. 'Tis all settled with the Schwellenberg. Do you not know," said Lady Florence, pushing the dish with a single remaining macaroon upon it, virtuously from her, "that Susan Verney is making all the interest in the world for the honour? But she was rude to the Schwellenberg one day—you know poor Susan's way!—

when they met in my drawing-room at Queen's Lodge, and the Schwellenberg will have none of her!"

"Say no more!" cried Kitty, and fires shot from her eyes.

"My love, I believe I have served you," said Lady Florence, replying to the eloquence of that glance. "My royals are not bartial to the Irish," said Schwellenberg. "Ah, but Madam," I says. "My Lady Kilcroney is not Irish. She is true-born English, and has vast wealth—widow of an Indian Nabob—vast wealth and a generous heart!—And you admire the lace, Madam!" says I, "in the very truth I was hoping I might venture to offer it to you, for 'tis lace that should be worn at court, Madam, and in no other place—and as I mentioned to you, my Lady Kilcroney and her Lord have practically severed all ties with Ireland. If you would accept the flounce, Madam, on my retirement (I think there is a narrow edging of rose-point to match). 'I will tink of what you say about my Lady Kilcroney,' croaks she. Am I not a good friend, Kitty?"

She looked at Kitty with such beaming kindness that all this latter's caprices vanished; she cast herself affectionately on Lady Florence's huge bosom and voted that she was indeed the best and dearest!

It was agreed between them before the large and jovial lady left the pleasant apartments overlooking the meadows, that she would call early next morning, tired, and a fund of humour and good humour that made her equal to most trials. Moreover she had a fighting spirit, and, she flattered herself, a charm of her own. If she did not get the better of Schwellenberg on the one hand, and ingratiate herself with Royalty on the other, then she was no longer incomparable Bellairs!

Her agreeable reflections were broken in upon by the entrance of my Lord Kilcroney.

Now, hot-blooded, red-headed Irishman as he was, it was the rarest thing in the world for this nobleman to be seriously out of temper with anyone, let alone with the wife of his bosom; but, as he flung himself into Kitty's hired parlour, he was in as irate a mood as he had ever indulged in, and that with his Lady.

"Here's a pretty business!" quoth he, and cast his hat on the table in the middle of the room, very nearly dislodging the glass dome which protected a gold filigree basket containing the most purple plums, the reddest strawberries, the bluest grapes that ever artist in wax produced. "Here's a pretty to-do!" cried Denis Kilcroney.

"There seems indeed to be a to-do!" retorted Kitty. She wheeled round from the window. "But you will condescend to explain the cause perhaps, my Lord?"

"So I hear you've got a place about the court, me darling," said Denis, plunging towards its accomplishment, when her little black page appeared at the open door, grinning at the sounds of dispute, and announced: "Mistress Lafone." And if the sight of dusky innocence amused was exasperating to my Lady, what can be said of the feelings aroused by the smile of minxish artfulness?

"Good heavens," cried Kitty. "And what brings you to Cheltenham, if one may ask?"

"Good-morrow, my sweet Kilcroney." This familiarity!

"Good-morrow, Madam." Kitty swept a curtsy to mark her distance, the while my Lord kissed the creature's hand, positively as if he liked doing so, and him but out of such a tantrum as never was.

"And what should bring me to Cheltenham—(no, my Lord, pray. I prefer the little stool. I do indeed)—why should not poor little me be here with the rest?"

"Why, indeed?" growled Kilcroney. "And what has brought you, my Lady, if one may inquire?"

"She thought little Denis looked pale!" cried my Lord, and gave a great guffaw.

"You may laugh, Madam," said Kitty, as Mrs. Lafone tinkled delicately. "There are feelings which only a mother can understand."

Mistress Lafone was childless.

"One excuse will serve as well as another." My Lord let himself fall into a chair that creaked threateningly beneath his weight.

"Oh, my Lord, I scarce know why, I have ever been sadly persecuted. I am the victim of evil tongues. My reputation has been assailed."

and report the result of Mrs. Schwellenberg's "tinking," since she had been given to understand that Her Majesty would deliver her gracious dismissal that evening, during the process of the Royal disrobing.

"You must hold yourself ready, my sweet child, to be at any point considered suitable along Her Majesty's path during the next few days. By the looks Her Majesty casts on me I am convinced Schwellenberg has kept her word, and prepared the ground 'ere we left Queen's Lodge. Well, she knew she would not get the rose-point otherwise."

Kitty stood reflecting in the bow-window long after Lady Florence's chairmen had reeled away with their burden towards Lord Fauconberg's small house on the hill, which had been placed at their Majesties' disposal. It could not be said that she had quite so altogether consuming a desire for the post of Lady-in-Waiting since hearing Lady Florence's talk and gazing on those swollen feet, but, rather than that Susan Verney—dark, overbearing Susan!—should have the advantage, Kitty would have stood on burning ploughshares. She had, thank Heaven, as good health as any lady in the kingdom, a back that was never into sarcasm, with a flushed countenance.

"Pon me soul, 'tis the grand lady you're going to be entirely! 'Tis the back seat your husband will have to be taking. Glory be to God, what's a husband? And an Irish one into the bargain!"

"Pray, my Lord," cried Kitty, all eagerness. "Where have you heard the news? For, as I'm a living woman, 'tis news to me."

"Ah! go on out of that." My Lord was certainly very angry, and more than usually Hibernian. "Didn't that fat baggage come straight out of these doors? Didn't she put that full moon face of hers out of the sedan window and bawl to her men to stop, and them with the sweat dripping off them, God help them! And 'oh,' she calls, 'My Lord Kilcroney,' she cries, 'tis quite settled,' she says. 'And your Kitty to take my post about Her Majesty.' Why, all Cheltenham could have heard her."

"Tush!" Kitty's peach-tinted countenance, agog with delight, fell. "Is that all? Why—" she was about to expound to Denis with some firmness the folly of giving way to passion over an event that was still in the uncertain future, at the same time conveying to him her clear intention to leave no stone unturned

"Oh, I seek for no excuse," quoth Molly Lafone. Crouching on the low stool, she had a singular air of astuteness, in spite of her fostered childishness. "I never can understand why people should not tell the truth." She raised arch eyes towards my Lord, while Kitty sat with the majesty of an Eastern idol, and had not as much as the quiver of an eyelash. "I'm here to curry favour with royalty," she laughed again sweetly, "like the rest of us!"

The brazenness of it! My Lord guffawed again. He certainly was in a most unpleasant mood.

"Huthen. I hope you'll be as successful as my Lady there!"

"Oh! My Lady Kilcroney!"

"Sure, isn't it the surprise of her life." Kilcroney once again waded heavily in sarcasm. "She hadn't as much as the faintest notion such a thing could happen to her—had you, me Lady? She hadn't as much as opened her mouth for the plum—it was perhaps the purple artifice on the table that suggested the simile—but didn't it drop into it? It's going to be Lady-in-Waiting she is, in place of my Lady Flo—"

"Oh! my Lord, say you so? Says he right, my dearest Lady Kilcroney?"

'Tis the most splendid, the most monstrous delightful news I've heard this long time. Oh!" cried Mrs. Lafone, clasping and wringing her hands in an ecstasy. "May not your little Molly rejoice with you?"

"You are vastly disinterested," said Kitty.

Mrs. Lafone gave her tinkling laugh.

"Ah, my Lady—indeed, my Lord, I have said that I am frank. Dearest, Lady Kilcroney, I will be frank—If I could obtain some little post—the teeniest weeniest little post at court—"

But Kitty interrupted, bouncing out of her stateliness.

"Pray, Mrs. Lafone, for what post should you consider yourself qualified about the august person of our gracious Queen?"

"Oh! My Lady Kilcroney, the least little post in all the world! Hath not the Queen appointed a plain Miss Burney reader? I believe I could very well be reader. Mr. Lafone says I have a silver tone in my voice, and our curate at home once told me—"

"Tush, the celebrated Miss Burney hath qualifications, child, which you in your foolishness fail to appreciate."

"Yet she is but a music teacher's daughter, Madam," said Molly with a mighty sigh. She dropped her white eyelids and turned a green glint on my Lord, and sighed again. "Or if not actually about her Majesty—who am I, indeed, to aspire to that Presence?—some office about yourself, dear Lady Kilcroney. I would be your secretary, your Lady-in-waiting, your devoted attendant!"

"This is folly," cried Kitty. "I am by no means appointed to my Lady Flo's post, and if I were—well, to be frank with you, Lafone, since you like frankness so much—you are the last person in the world I should ever be instrumental in bringing to court. Heavens!" cried Kitty, gazing upwards at the low ceiling, as if she saw through it into the celestial regions. "What discretion, what faultless propriety of conduct, what a delicate sense of responsibility, what a blameless record should be demanded of one who would enter that sacred circle!"

(It was the glint of her visitor's green eye at my Lord which gave this stern decision to Kitty's tones.)

Here, quite unexpectedly, and with admirable effectiveness, large tears rose in Mrs. Lafone's eyes and rolled down her cheeks, without in the least disturbing the prettiness of her pointed visage. My Lord cast a glance from one to the other; it was lit with a tender sympathy as it fell on this touching impersonation of grief, and kindled with reproach as it shot to Kitty.

Mrs. Lafone gave a small sob.

"Your sweet lady," she said, now audaciously addressing her male champion, "has ever been a friend in need."

'Tis for that, that I have ventured, my Lord, that I have ventured to come to her to-day, hearing—yes! I will own it, I already knew that she was like to be next in the Queen's choice. I made the journey hither in the hopes—'tis for no reason of petty vanity, no mere envious ambition—"

(Thus the minx)

"oh! my Lord, I scarce know why, I have ever been sadly persecuted. I am the victim of evil tongues! . . . My reputation has been assailed."

"Ha!" said Kitty. The ejaculation leaped from her.

Molly Lafone produced another silver sob. "Quite unfoundedly, I do assure you! My conscience is spotless, my Lady Kilcroney, spotless!"—she caught Kitty's eye, and went on in a humble voice—"in this instance! Indeed, my Lady—but Mr. Lafone—I am sadly maligned, he is suspicious, he—"

Here the unfortunate young woman became quite incoherent in her demonstrations of distress. She wrung her white hands with extra pathos. Another large tear flowed, and a volley of little sobbing, disjointed phrases accompanied it, "domestic happiness—ignorance of the world—poor little me, country-bred and guileless—salvation or despair."

In the midst, Kitty rose, returning to her majesty.

"I must put a stop to a scene so useless and so painful. How is it possible, Madam, you do not see that every word you utter but marks the impossibility of your request? Pray, my Lord, see Mistress Lafone to her chair."

"Kitty!" cried Kilcroney, springing to his feet. He had not thought it of her, to requite these open-hearted confidences with insult; to turn so trusting and touching a creature into the street; a lady—an old friend! "Pray Mistress Lafone, let us be offering you a dish of tea," cried he.

There are days when everything goes askew. Kitty's great footman marched into the room and presented his mistress with a letter which, he said, had just been brought by a riding messenger. Kitty took it from the salver with all the air of one glad of the diversion, but no sooner had she perused it than she exclaimed, in tones of such consternation, that my Lord leant forward and took it out of her hand. He exclaimed in his turn, but in accents of pleasure.

"Why, what is this? Sure, Alanna, there is naught here to upset you, 'tis the best of good fortune on the contrary! Here's your sweet friend, my Lady Mandeville, actually at Malvern and proposing to drive over and spend the day with you to-morrow, bringing her little rogue to play with ours."

"Oh, this is intolerable," cried Kitty, "this is past bearing! Bid the messenger wait. Good heavens, do I not hear him riding away?—Call him back, my Lord, call him back! On no account must my Lady Mandeville be permitted to visit me to-morrow."

My Lord stood rooted to the spot, and the veins on his forehead swelled. Kitty rushed to the window and hailed vigorously; the rhythmic footfalls of a horse receding at slow pace along the cobble stones was, on a sudden, altered to the clatter of a returning trot.

"Damnation!" cried my Lord. "This passes all!"

Mistress Lafone had stopped the wringing of hands and the production of tears, and was all malicious interest.

Kilcroney had entered into a towering passion. He protested that it was the most monstrous low thing, that he forbade my Lady to behave so base to her friend.

"Tare an' ounds!" cried he, "if it wasn't ashamed you were, and that, not a minute ago, to be enjoying the finest hospitality in the world, the kindest, the most open-hearted, 'tis not ashamed you should be to return a thrifle of it! Shame!" ejaculated Denis. "Shame! 'tis on the other leg. Gad, 'tis the shameful bit of meanness you'd be practising and 'tis ashamed I am of you meself (that I should live to say it). Your best friend! And all for what? For what if ye please? For the favour of them that never as much as acknowledged your existence. 'Pon me soul, rather than wound the feelings of that angel upon earth, that fair, fond, gentle, noble creature—"

My Lord's voice cracked. "I'd see the whole of Windsor, and Kew to boot, tumble into the Liffey."

Kitty, white under her delicate smears of rouge, sat down at her writing-table with the most sublime air of offended virtue, but the hand that dipped the pen into the ink shook, and there were tears in the voice which presently declared that if ever there was woman here maligned by her own husband, it was my Lady Kilcroney: she who had not liked to disturb her Lord, but who had nevertheless noticed a red spot behind their darling little Denis's ear that very morning; which spot, as every one who was a mother knew, might very well betoken no less a malady than the measles, which malady, being highly infectious to young children, she, as a mother, now felt it her duty to put off her cherished Lady Mandeville and the adored little Imprington to a more auspicious day.

"Spot!" interrupted my Lord, with a roar between derision and wrath, and

"Spot?" cooed Mistress Lafone, now letting herself go openly to insolence. "My dearest Lady Kilcroney, you are too droll!"

There was contempt written on the countenances of the pair so odiously conjoined against Kitty; neither of them being subtle enough to see that my Lady was content with any excuse, so long as it flung a veil of elegance over her set purpose.

This incomparable woman recovered herself, rose, summoned Pompey, and sent him forth with her letter to my Lord Mandeville's groom. She watched its delivery, through the window, and having beheld the man start off again, returned to the centre of the room, made in silence a profound curtsy, which included her Lord and her visitor, and sailed forth, closing the door carefully behind her.

My Lord let himself fall again into the arm-chair, and once more this article of furniture protested with ominous creaks and cracks.

"There's not a stick in the place, bejabbers, that isn't as rotten as pears. 'Pon my word," grumbled Denis Kilcroney, "I wish the plaguy waters had never been discovered, I do indeed; 'tis a poor thing when a man's own son and heir is made a weapon against him, and him but turned of three. 'Little Denis is pale, and we must to Cheltenham. And we'll lie at Lady Mandeville's, which is on our way, my love' (and it thirty miles out, taking the back and the forth of it). 'And our little Denis will have a playfellow, 'twill be so vastly good for him. Little Imprington and he will be comrades.' And scarce are we settled at Imprington Court with as good entertainment—aye—and as generous ('tis the cellar of the world my Lord Mandeville has, and 'tis as free with it he is—troth, as I'd be meself if my Lady'd let me, and I can give him no finer character!) No sooner are we settled, and scarce a cork drawn ye may say, but 'tis 'Little Imprington is too rough for our darling Denis. He will teach him ill ways, he will do him a hurt. And Imprington Court is a thought too low for the child's health. And we must move on to Cheltenham, my love, or there will not be a lodging to be had.' And you should have seen the farewells, the clings, the embracings, and the tears, and heard the promises. 'We shall meet again soon, my dearest, dearest Rachel. I vow I'll not be parted from the most cherished of my friends! And now 'tis: 'Keep away—little Denis hath a spot! To be sure, our dearest Rachel must not cast a blight over my Lady's Court prospects.'"

"But why, pray you, why, my Lord Kilcroney, should my Lady Mandeville cast a blight? Is she not in the Court favour?"

Mistress Molly's tones were as insinuating as the fillet of sweetness that issues from a flute; nevertheless, Denis, starting from his black mood, gave her a sudden odd look.

"Prithee, why, my Lord?"

Kitty was in the right of it. The little jade was as false as loaded dice! As if every one did not know poor Rachel's story; how she had been a Quaker and an actress, and my Lord Mandeville's mistress before she had been his wife; and how, save for that one stain, which, indeed, had been the fall of a pure woman piteously and devotedly in love, she had ever shone in a wicked world, the noblest example to her sex.

Mistress Lafone caught my Lord's look upon her and deemed it time to depart. Without waiting, therefore, for his reply to her question, she feigned horror at the lateness of the hour, and bustled away from the Kilcroney lodgings, malcontent with her visit, the more so that my Lord Kilcroney brought a wooden countenance and a dry manner to the very hall door.

She went forth down the single street and across the meadows; for her rooms were in an out-of-the-way cottage, far from the fashionable quarter patronised by the well-to-do. Mrs. Lafone's fortunes were indeed at a low ebb. Her elderly, niggardly husband had vowed some time ago that he would pay no more debts for her, and he was keeping his vow. In her efforts at self-extrication, Mistress Molly, not having a scrupulous delicacy of conduct, had become further considerably entangled. A scandal threatened which might be the undoing of her. And there was my Lady Kilcroney not only declining to help her, but as good as turning her out of the house!

Molly Lafone was sharp of scent as a weasel. It was unpleasantly clear to her that the irate great lady was determined to seize the first opportunity of cutting her altogether; and when my Lady Kilcroney, leader of society as she was, cast her off, she would be lost indeed! She had no thought in her breast, as she walked along the road between the flat fields, but the longing to pay Kitty out.

The way was deserted. Evening shadows were lengthening across the mellowness of the sun-steeped plain. Molly Lafone slackened her pace. Why, indeed, should she hurry back to the stuffy little room where she could afford herself no better supper than bread and milk?

Truly, if there are angels who reward the virtuous, there must be little demons who provide dainties for those who serve the ways of evil! There, just at her feet, shining quite golden in the rays of the setting sun, lay a letter.

It lay so that its superscription was visible, and Molly could hardly believe her eyes when she read in Kitty's writing the words: "For the hand of my Lady, the Countess Mandeville."

"The careless fellow," said she, "he's dropped it from his belt as he jogged along. Pshaw, how I hate a clumsy fool!"

Then she laughed shrilly. "My Lady Mandeville will never get her Kitty's affectionate answer, nor hear how little Denis hath a spot, and she will come driving in to-morrow to hang herself and her tarnished name round Kitty's neck for all Cheltenham to see, under the nose of the virtuous Queen Charlotte. That is very well done!" cried Molly. "That is a very fit punishment for such base intentions. I am very glad."

And lest anyone should be busybody enough to pick up the dropped letter and forward it to its destination, which would be a sad interference with the just action of Providence, Mistress Lafone picked it up herself and minced it into small pieces as she walked along towards her cottage lodging. She had quite a good appetite for her bread and milk that night.

It had been my Lady Kilcroney's intention to keep her cherished little Denis in his cot, for the space of at least a day, for indeed there was more than one red mark on the satin of his small, plump body, and Kitty vowed it was of a piece with the rest of my Lord's brutality to declare that those who leave their own homes for the discomforts of lodgings must expect the occasional flea. But on receipt of a letter sent round by my Lady Flora's woman, she promptly altered her plans, and ordered the protesting cherub to be arrayed in his best robe-coat covered with fine muslin, and his white satin hat with feathers.

My Lord, as soon as his infant's roars had been soothed by candies, picked up the letter which Kitty had dropped on the floor in her hurried exit to her bed-chamber; and, while his Lady was alternately pealing at her bell and shouting for Lydia, without compunction read it.

"My Dearest Lady Kilcroney: 'Tis all arranged. I consider my freedom well purchased at the price of the rose-point flounce, and the service to a friend, no less, by the trimmings to match. Her Majesty received me in her closet last evening, and the matter was settled quick. I must confess, dearest Kitty, with all the veneration and love (these words were heavily underlined) that I cherish for her August Person, I did feel it hard to find that my poor feet were represented as the dropsy. Dropsy, my love. And I but turned of thirty! 'You should have warned me,' said Her Majesty, 'that you were suffering from a disease.' 'Ma'am,' said I, 'if disease there is—(I was afraid to deny it, dear Kitty, lest the fetters should not be struck off my aching ankles)—'twas contracted in Your Majesty's service.' And now if my Kilcroney has a taste for gilded slavery (though there's less gilding than you would believe), let her be at the entrance of the pump room, to receive Her Majesty at the head of the other lady visitors, on her first visit thither this very morning at eleven o'clock. The Gentlemen-in-Waiting are informing the other notabilities of the town, and Her Majesty is prepared for the little ceremony which she desires shall have the appearance of an Imprromptu, it being her wish to avoid state during the Royal Visit and not to be incommoded by the crowd. If your little Denis were to offer a bunch of roses, it would, I think, please the Queen, who likes to see ladies occupied of their children and is interested in any who are about the age of the Princess Amelia. From what Mrs. Schwellenburg—oh! Kitty, to think of that toad festooned about with my lace—hath wrote to me (thank God we have left the frog-fancier behind at Windsor) I understand you can consider the appointment as good as made—"

The letter dropped from Kilcroney's hand. His goodnatured face (for in spite of tantrums he was to the core a man of good nature), clouded with genuine dismay. It looked as if the plaguey business, which he had regarded in the light of a mere game, was like to turn to earnest.

Why, in the name of Heaven, a woman with all the world could give her, and a devoted husband besides, should break up her family life for the pleasures of an annual three months' slavery—Lady Florence had well named it—passed his comprehension.

"Nay, Lydia," Kitty's voice was uplifted in the other room; "take back the tabby; aye, and the satin cloak from Madame Mirabel's. I have thought better of it, child. Put away the Eglantine new hat with the feathers. I will wear muslin and a plain straw. I wish to Heaven," cried Kitty pettishly, "that there was a milliner in the Kingdom who could run up a hat to suit a lady's eye-lashes or the tilt of her nose outside Paris."

"There's the Italian straw we bought last time we was staying over there at Madame the Duchess's," said Lydia tentatively; "the same your ladyship ordered for yourself to wear at the Feet at Trianon to which the French Queen asked us—and a sweet elegant creature Her Majesty is, with all her fancies for dairies and such—and the thunderstorm coming on it was the disappointment of the world, and one that I am not like to forget in a hurry! Sure your ladyship, ain't forgotten it? A plain rice straw with a ribbon round, but with a set to it! Aye, and trimmed by my blood-niece, as is apprenticed to Madame Eglantine out of my own poor savings; me being always one to stand by my family, cost what it do."

"The Italian straw," my Lady reflected; "'twas monstrous thoughtful of you, child, to pack it—la, Lydia, 'tis the very thing—trimmed by your niece did you say? Nay, only the genius of Eglantine could twist a bow like that. Put it on my head. Why, 'tis perfect—aye, I will wear it. Her Majesty desires simplicity."

"Simplicity, is it?" Kilcroney groaned. "God help us all!"

As Kitty sallied forth, all in vapoury white, fresh and sweet as a privet blossom, her face delicately pink under the artful shepherdess hat, Pompey following with the great rose-bunch in a band-box, and little Denis trotting alongside scarlet-cheeked from a triumphant battle royal over the wearing of gloves, my Lord looked after them with some melancholy.

"I'll stroll along presently and keep in the background, I'd not like to be blighting Kitty's prospects after the fashion of yonder poor Rachel. By all accounts Her gracious Majesty Queen Charlotte is no more like to fancy an Irishman than the unhappy girl that has a mistake to her name."

Kitty had determined to walk to the pump room. 'Twas scarce a hundred yards away, and "squeeze those crisp flounces into a chair before they had served their purpose—never!" She had taken but a few steps along the street when who should cross her but Mrs. Lafone. Molly, all in the modesty of lilac dimity, with pensiveness, something even approaching penitence, on her pert face. Kitty was in a fair humour, and as her little enemy flung her a deprecating glance of green eyes, actually paused and smiled.

"Whither away, Lafone?"

"Alas, my Lady Kilcroney, stepping into the pump room anon to drink my glass of the waters, I heard as how Her Majesty was expected, and how you and the other ladies of note are to receive her on this, her first appearance. My Lady Kilcroney, knowing myself so unfit, feeling myself so out of spirits, I deemed it more becoming to retire till all was over."

Now Kitty, riding on the top of the wave, was a trifle intoxicated. It was in a tone of almost Royal patronage that she exclaimed:

"Why should you miss the sight, child? You could very well find a little place where you could see and not be seen. Retrace your steps with me."

"Oh! My Lady Kilcroney," cries Molly, with her dramatic clasp of the hands, "was there ever anyone so truly benevolent as you are!"

Hanging her head, the little minx started off, a humble step behind her patroness, and, looking over his shoulder at her, Denis the younger was fascinated by the wicked mockery on her face, and nearly fell into a puddle for staring.

There was no excitement in the town, for Her Majesty's intention was known but to the favoured few. The Royal Family, it was bruited, were still reposing from the fatigues of their journey. There was, however, a small group of gentlemen about the pump room doors, in elegant morning attire, and two or three barouches and as many chairs were in the very act of depositing their fair burdens as Lady Kilcroney sailed up. She was just in time, indeed, to see Lady Verney—black-browed Susan, panting, flushed, incredibly plumed—hurl herself out of her hired sedan. At sight of Kitty this personage halted in her rush forward into the pump room.

"You here, dear Kilcroney?" her voice shook. There was fury in her eye.

"Even so, dear Verney. Pray, my Lord Courtown, shall I take my stand on this spot? Hither with the flowers, Pompey. My little son is to offer these to Her Majesty, Colonel Digby; certainly 'twould be a mercy if you would have the kindness to hold them till the right moment comes. Such tender years are scarcely to be trusted!—Nay, Denis, lambkin, no more sugar plums till we get home again, or little pandies would be so sticky, Denis couldn't give the nosegay to the beautiful Queen—What a pity, my my Lady Kilcroney, for the royal party might be expected any moment.

"Mrs. Tracy, ma'am, as one conversant in these matters, will you stand at my Lady's elbow?—My Lady Kilcroney, Mrs. Tracy—Her Majesty's Senior Bed-chamber Woman, who is at the waters on her own account."

My Lady Verney, biting her lip, stamped heavily on her neighbour's foot as she shifted her position. Turning at the low cry, her fierce black eyes met the plaintive green ones of Mrs. Lafone, who in spite of her discreet protestations, had taken as forward a place in the group as well she could. As a rule Molly was in no better favour with Susan Verney than with the rest of the coterie, but at that moment they shared a sentiment which made them suddenly and momentarily sympathetic.

"Oh, my Lady Verney," whispered Molly, "did you ever see anyone so sadly cocked up as our poor Kitty? It

'her Royals' back. And if Kitty blushed she had nevertheless the most elegant ease. Her curtsy was a model; the dignified modesty with which she advanced and then retreated within the due measure of etiquette was perfect of its kind. And when the incident took place, which might indeed have proved awkward, of Master Denis declining to part with his posy, his mother saved the situation. "Denis," quoth she, bending but not whispering; all with a modest assurance that could not have been bettered by one who had been years at Court. "Lambkin, do you not remember what I bid you? To whom were you too ffer these flowers?"

"To the beautiful Queen," said the child, his great brown eyes roaming about as if he were seeking—as well he might, poor innocent!—whom the description might fit. The Queen, with a flattered smile, herself took the offering from his chubby fingers.

"But it is a stroke of genius!" exclaimed the little Frenchwoman. She hated Pamela, but she was, above all, an artist.

dearest Susan, you should have made yourself so fine. By Her Majesty's most express wish, all is to have the appearance of the simplest impromptu! Still, my skirts are fairly wide. If you place yourself behind me—"

Place herself behind Kitty! Had her beloved friend run mad, she that was always so flighty? My Lady Verney to place herself in the rear, be hidden by another's flounces, she who had posted day and night, all the way from Hertfordshire, upon the news of a probably vacancy about the Queen's person! Was it possible that Kitty, with her Irish husband, labelled with such a name, could fancy that she was like to meet with the Queen's favour? Susan was sorry for her poor friend. She tossed her head with a snort. My Lady Verney had something of the appearance of a handsome horse.

But stupefaction succeeded indignation when Lord Courtown, very civilly addressing her, begged her to take her place with the other ladies in the rear of frightens me for her, it does indeed. I fear such pride must have a fall."

Although Susan could see no sign of this prognostication being fulfilled, it comforted her nevertheless; and she was able to bear, with a better equanimity than any who knew her would have thought possible, the painful spectacle of my Lady Kilcroney's success with the Queen. Success it indubitably was, though Her Majesty was a dry woman and not given to displays of affability. It was evident that she had come prepared to be pleased with Kitty Kilcroney and that pleased she found herself. And truly, Kitty in her snowy flounces, so charmingly blushing under her wide-brimmed hat—which was indeed trimmed by Lydia's niece, Miss Pamela Pounce—Kitty so daintily maternal with the sturdy little boy clutching his roses, was as pretty a picture as any would wish to gaze upon.

The two blooming Princesses exclaimed upon the darling child, and good-natured Lady Flo was one broad beam behind "Pretty rogue!" said Princess Augusta.

When the other introductions had been gone through it seemed to be nobody's business to present Mistress Lafone; and though the equerries looked tentatively at her and then at my Lady Kilcroney, nothing could be less responsive than that usually alert being. So Molly made an artless curtsy as became her simplicity, and thought, in her disloyal heart, how frumpish and dowdy Her Majesty looked; and wondered if 'twas Miss Burney who appeared so shortsighted and awkward and timid, with no more air than nothing at all. And save for the gentlemen, who were very personable and had bright looks about them as if they might be enjoyable company to a woman of spirit, there was really naught in this vision of the Court which would make her, little Molly, yearn for it—a vast stiffness and dullness indeed! If it had not been that needs must when the devil drives she would have snapped her slender fingers and 'thank you,' but as matters stood—

The closely-patterned wallpaper employed in this room shows a beautiful blending of ashes-of-rose and quiet violet against a pale fawn background. The ceiling is tinted to a lighter fawn, with the ivory-enameled wood-trim as a pleasant contrast. The two-toned rug is in a rather light shade of taupe and the chair cushions are of dull violet.

The Reposeful Bedroom

BY COLLIER STEVENSON

TO fix definitely the status of the bedroom as one of the most important components of the modern home, it is only necessary to recall that, under average conditions, virtually one-third of our earthly span is given over to the recreating sway of sleep. That, however, this point is often utterly disregarded, the poorly-planned and inadequately-appointed sleeping-quarters which mar so many otherwise livable and attractive houses would seem to indicate. Indeed, the sleeping-quarters appear to have merely happened—although, perhaps, in the same house the living and service departments show every evidence of careful planning. This, of course, is fundamentally wrong: the bedrooms should receive the utmost consideration, both in the planning and the decorating of a home—and, if the requirements of the family, the servants and the guests are at all extensive or complicated, the bedroom accommodation might well be studied before attention is devoted to the remainder of the house.

In hoping to achieve the best results in the sleeping quarters, the homemaker, whether amateur or professional, cannot afford to overlook the dual matter of aspect and outlook. The Southerly aspect is, naturally, the ideal one, as it assures generous sunlight during the greater part of the day—and, if at all possible, each bedroom of a house should have the benefit of direct sunshine at some hour of the day. Sunlight, too, during the long months of winter, is not only a tonic, but an economical asset in supplementing to some extent the artificial heat within doors. The aspect of a bedroom is, however, partially dependent upon the nature of the outlooks that the chosen site of a house affords: for, if there are any especially agreeable outlooks, the bedrooms are made all the more attractive by commanding them—except when that involves a North exposure, which is rarely satisfactory for a sleeping-room.

Another vital point in bedroom planning is ventilation. Every bedroom should have some cross-draught, whether direct or diagonal. To secure this, bay-windows are to be commended for the bedrooms which cannot be accorded a corner situation facilitating windows upon two sides. The long-cherished idea that high ceilings promote good ventilation is today properly viewed as a fallacy: we at length have come to realize that the nearer the ceiling is to the window tops, the more readily can all the air in a room be put into circulation. And, incidentally, we also appreciate that comparatively low ceilings are of advantage economically in the artificial heating of a house; as they prevent the formation of a "pocket" of superheated air in the upper portion of a room that would tend to leave the lower portion difficult to keep at a pleasant temperature.

Strange as it may seem, many bedrooms are actually destitute of suitable wall-spaces for even the most essential pieces of furniture—for, even in the smallest of bedrooms, a bed and some type of bureau must be viewed as essential or fixed pieces. To these, as the scope of the bedroom permits, are to be added such portable pieces as dressing-tables, chiffoniers, writing-desks and chairs: and, for each, when the sleeping quarters are being planned, a suitable space should be provided according to the respective needs of each bedroom.

In this connection, amateur decorators might profitably follow the practice of many professionals in studying the placement of furniture by charts; drawn, say, to the scale of one-quarter inch to the foot. First of all, a plan of the room which is to be furnished is carefully drawn to show all the windows and doors, and thereby the unbroken wall-spaces that remain. A diagram of each piece of furniture is drawn to the same scale on heavy paper and cut out: and every little diagram is then tried out on the room-plan in various locations until an entirely convenient and satisfactory arrangement has been attained for the room as a whole.

A valuable feature, especially in houses heated by steam or hot water, is an open fireplace in the bedroom—considered primarily as a means of ventilation. And a fireplace is quite as decorative as it is useful. The archaic idea of considering a mirror indispensable above the mantel is, however, rather illogical; as there is invariably a more convenient mirror over the bureau, and possibly another on the dressing-table or chiffonier. A full-length mirror set in a door-panel is always useful: and it is especially appropriate for small bedrooms, as it saves the floor-space which might otherwise be occupied by a cheval-glass. Unoccupied spaces in a bedroom increase the desired airiness of effect—and, indeed, the fewer pieces of furniture in any bedroom, the better!

Lavatories are now frequently installed in bedrooms. Although they are far from ornamental, they certainly mar the appearance of the rooms no more than the furniture seen in many homes. With a little preliminary study, however, it is quite possible to provide either an enclosed recess or a partially screened alcove for the lavatory: and thus make this convenient accessory much more sightly.

On the floor of this sunny bedroom, a plain rug of reposeful blue green coloring is employed with excellent results. The walls and the ceiling are painted old ivory and the woodwork is enameled in ivory-white. Very decorative use is made of a glazed English chintz: its ivory-white background patterned in odd shades of blue, green and yellow. The curtains of this chintz hang to the floor from a shaped lambrequin.

Ride a Cock Horse

By Louise Morey Bowman

Illustrated by W. R. Purves

The Merry-Go-Round at our county Fair,
When I saw it first, seemed to me
Just the merriest, wildest, craziest thing—
As queer as it ever could be!
Machinery like that!—made for play!
Folks riding around in a ring,
And the jolliest music I ever heard.
And a bell that went ding ding!

O the young and the old they all got on Till Gilpin he said to me
"Come Lady Queen Anne I'll buy you a ride
If you're not too proud," says he.
So he held me there in the queer little seat
With the prancing horse's head,
That bobbed up and down like a living thing—
And after three rounds he said
"I've paid the man to let us stay on Till I've had my say. I'm slow,
But I've loved you hard for ten years now, Anne,
And this Merry-Go-Round she'll go
Till I've got your answer. I made this plan
A good many months ago."

O I never felt anything like the wind
A-rushing about my ears—
But that rollicking, frolicking music played
Till I somehow lost my fears.
While I thought all the time what a funny thing
That Gilpin, who's so slow,
Should be the man to make such a plan—
How that Merry-Go-Round did go!

And when it seemed as if all the folks
Had dropped off into the sky!—
And as if I'd give anything just to stop—
And I wanted to laugh and cry—
He said "Well—Anne?" and I said "Yes—John"
With my eyes on the bobbing head
Of my prancing horse. John called to the man—
And the Merry-Go-Round stopped dead.

When the bearer returned, Travice was having his breakfast on the verandah. "The lady was gone, Sahib, and I was not able to deliver the note."

The Surrender of Richard Travice

BY SELWYN RICE

Illustrated by G. W. L. Bladen

A HOT haze hung over the station as the train pulled in to Ranapur. Almost the blue hills of the distance were swallowed out of sight. It was the quiet of the day when all India eats, and a hush lies over the crowded city,—one can almost hear a sigh of relief as the sun goes down. An officer in sun helmet and the service uniform was standing waiting for the train; his horse held by a tall Sikh who was also keeping an eye on two restive ponies hitched to a dak garrow which a little Hindoo was doing his best to quiet. As the train stopped but one passenger alighted. With a quick glance up to the hills, a young girl in a smart linen suit and a most bewitching hat stepped down and looked hesitantly about. The officer immediately came forward and saluted.

"I believe you are Miss Markyate? The Wyntons asked me to start you out—I was riding in to the Club, and these Hindoos are rather hard to understand sometimes, unless you speak their language—my name is Travice."

"Mrs. Wynton did not come to meet me?" She looked up into eyes rather wearied, but there was a quizzical smile playing about the corners of his mouth. This decidedly ornamental young person with the look of some new and wonderful thing in her eyes, was not exactly what he had expected when Mrs. Wynton had asked him to look out for—"Roddy's new governess, you know, coming to-day on the down train. I hope she'll prove," and her voice had trailed off as it had a way of doing. "You might see that Ran-I-San finds her."

"No, the Wyntons—er—were having a tea party or something of the sort—Impossible to get away. I'll just put you in this cart and get your boxes, and Ran-I-San will have you there in no time."

A shadow seemed to cross the lovely face. "The tall man looks quite ferocious. I hope the journey isn't far—I'd much prefer to try the little chap. You see," with a wistful smile, "I'm not quite used to the natives yet, but they look so interesting, don't they?"

There was a bit of a tremor to the smile and Travice suddenly decided that it was rather rotten of the Wyntons not to at least have sent Saiki to meet this young girl who must have come direct from England. Her clothes had a look of Bond Street. After all, Mainwaring and his bridge could wait. He would at least see that she got safely to the Hill Station.

"I find after all that it will be necessary to go back myself—must see about some saddles before the morning. So if all your boxes are here, we'll carry on."

It was a dazzling smile which met his as he turned to beckon the Sikh. "I am relieved! You know, I've loved the freedom of travelling alone, but I did expect some one to meet me."

As they started, the haze seemed to lift a moment and they had a glimpse of the beauty of the hills and as they drove quickly along the dusty road, the darkness fell, quite suddenly, as it does in Northern India. Travice trotting his horse beside the dak garrow, listened with his quizzical smile to this young girl's frank chatter of her journey, and surprised that he listened at all, whom ladies found most charming when they left him alone, and then answering with a less detached air as she questioned him about the country. Here was a subject very close to his rather steel-clad heart,—if he had one, which was much in doubt in the Hill Station, and he found an interested listener. As they rode on, he wondered why this ardent creature with her enthusiasm was going to spend her days teaching little Roddy Wynton his multiplication table, and helping his ayah keep her charge amused when his mother was having one of her many bridge parties. However, they arrived in due time at the Wynton's bungalow, one of a line much the same. There were lights through the trees, coming and going like fireflies; music and gay laughter drifted to them from the long windows, figures in evening dress flitted to and fro, and from the verandah came the after-dinner smoke of contented men.

"How lovely! How perfectly charming! What a sweet way to arrive—landing in the midst of a party. It looks exactly as I've read in so many Anglo-Indian novels—but there should be a lurking danger to make it altogether brave and romantic," she said laughingly.

"There is always a lurking danger in India." Travice's voice was stern as he answered her gay words, and his brows came together a bit. How—but he gave it up; this child, favored of fortune as she seemed, talked as if she were to be one of the guests and yet distinctly he had understood she was to be the governess, and especially for the Wyntons. How could she expect—but his reflections were cut short, for as they drove up Mrs. Wynton came out with her inevitable Subaltern.

"Miss Markyate, so glad you have come, Major Travice, so kind of you to come back. We are just getting up a table of bridge, and Molly Saunders has been desolate all evening because you were not here. I told her that your excuse this evening was a very poor one. Ran-i-San, take Miss Markyate to Roddy's ayah. She will show you your room—you will want to unpack."

The girl looked brightly at Mrs. Wynton, but as she had turned to Travice, and was chattering to him in her gayest manner, she looked away again and discovered the Hindoo was making an effort to have her follow him. Travice felt her start and saw the quiet way she went with the little brown man and for some reason he felt a sudden distaste for Mrs. Wynton's chatter, so with a brief good-night and a plea of work to be done, he jumped on his horse and was off to his own quarters.

They were very comfortable quarters, a large bungalow which he had rented furnished from some people going "home" on leave. Coming out soon after the war where he had been badly smashed up, he found in the pulling together of his troop of Lancers and the duties attendant, work to quiet that restless feeling which the war had left as a legacy to so many.

But instead of working he sat down to smoke on his verandah. The vision of a small white face with the light gone from ardent eyes, would not let him rest so he paced up and down until he called himself a fool for not staying at the Club and turned in.

IT was some time before Travice saw the Wyntons again but in answer to a note to dinner he went round one evening a fortnight later and found quite a party gathered. There was Mainwaring, the ever-present, and Colonel Masefield and the Cunninghams; in fact the usual set that gathered at the Wyntons, including a few visiting potentates, very important in their own eyes who had come up for a glance at Indian conditions and would go back to England and write a book on the gaiety of the English and the poor down-trodden natives. And their word would be taken for law while the same brave holders of the Empire's frontiers danced on with death at their door. They were having a very gay time indeed and as Travice wandered from one group to another, he looked in vain for Roddy's governess. The wearied eyes with a glint of bitterness in their depths grew more tired as the evening wore on, and he found an excuse to go early.

Mrs. Wynton followed him out to the verandah. "You are a hermit soul, Major Travice. I was telling Guy Mainwaring we felt that we had made quite a triumph to get you here to-night and now you are off so early."

Travice made some slight excuse as he took a cigarette from his case, "How is Roddy and his new governess, Miss Markyate?"

"Oh, they get along beautifully; Roddy adores her. The ayah tells me she brought trunks of pretty clothes and has as many colours in satin slippers as I have—she likes to take long walks."

Travice murmured something about the walks being good for Roddy, "They go towards the town I suppose?"

"No, I believe she usually goes the other way, towards the hills."

The next morning Travice left word with his bearer that he had gone toward Ramah to see about getting some beaters together for a tiger hunt in that district. A man-eater had appeared lately it seemed and the news had spread through the village like wild-fire. When he saw a white dress among the rocks and a little boy playing beside his brown ayah he drew up his horse and left him to graze while he made his way across the rocks towards a girlish figure seated under a deodar tree, her head leaning back, her face turned towards the hills. She looked up as he came to her and a wistful smile greeted him.

"My cavalier of the open road and the start of the glorious adventure! And you too, leave the poor governess to find her place."

He smiled at her. "It isn't all so wonderful now—our India?"

"Oh yes, quite; it was my own foolishness, I quite realize. It is just as interesting but somehow it doesn't seem to matter to me... I am not of it. You see I just suddenly took the notion to come to India—quite a wild idea, every one thought, but I was so tired of the daily round and I hadn't anyone I loved, to leave. I'd always been interested in India and one day when I saw an advertisement for a governess to come to Ranapur, passage paid etc., I thought, 'Suppose I do!' But why should I bore you with all this?"

Travice had seated himself beside her on the rock and was clipping the bushes with his riding crop, "When I'm bored I'll let you know," and somehow as he looked down on her he seemed so strong and quiet she thought the lines in his face seemed not so hard.

"Did you come out alone?" he asked, "Oh yes, I had a most wonderful time on the boat although I'd spent almost my last penny on clothes in London; you should see my pretty dresses, three if you please and perfect dreams. You see I had a vague idea of being one of the family or anyway of looking on at some pretty parties and I wanted to look beautiful, looking on, but it seems that one does not even look on. One reads Roddy to sleep, or sits on the stairs."

"Do you do that?" Travice grunted, "the other night—the affair for Betty Saunders?"

"Oh yes, I had quite a nice view from the turn in the stairs. I saw you having a lovely time with Miss Saunders; she is quite beautiful, isn't she—she is so gay."

"As a matter of fact I had a rotten time—awfully silly affairs, dances. By the way, you shouldn't stay out here as late as this, especially at this time. There promises to be trouble with the natives, and we've had word of a tiger seen about here. I'll see you home this evening but turn in after this an hour earlier."

She stood up as he rose and as she looked up at him and her eyes met his dark ones, she drew her breath sharply, "How kind of you to think of us. Roddy and I will do as you say."

Roddy had the time of his young life on the journey home. He was lifted to a most exalted station on the Major's horse while his ayah walked behind. Travice leading the horse looked down at the shining head which came just to his shoulder and he thought the sweet face had regained some of its love of life which he had noticed when he had seen her first. He did not know that his own had lost some of its bitterness. It was indeed almost dark when they reached the gate.

"Thank you for a happy day. India looks to-night as if any wonderful and beautiful thing might happen to even me."

"Suppose we try that out by daylight. How about a visit to the Bazaar to-morrow?"

"Oh, but Mrs. Wynton won't let us go to the Bazaar—I have so longed to, but she says we must not go alone."

"What do you think of me as an escort? Suppose you leave the little chap at home, he has probably been there before scores of times on shopping expeditions with his ayah. Do you think you could stand me alone for an afternoon—along with the Bazaar?"

"But that would be a party. Do you really mean it?" She turned a face flushed with pleasure.

"I usually mean what I say," he said with a twist in his smile.

The great trees drooped over the gate shutting out the world. There had been callers sitting out on the verandah as they came up, white dresses and low rippling voices and some stares as Travice appeared. He had nodded to Mrs. Wynton and her friends but would not come in though they called to him chaffingly and when Alison got to her room trunks were pulled out and boxes lifted down and "Roddy, do you think this white dress is the prettiest or the blue? I'm going to the Bazaar to-morrow with the Major Sahib."

"I'd wear the white one and the parasol that looks like violets. Mama says that Major Travice never looks at a girl's clothes and Guy says he never looks at a girl at all so he won't see them any way, but I like the white one best."

SO on the morrow any one walking on the road to Ranapur where it branches off towards the bungalows, could have seen a tall officer with a dark

He came across the room and put his hands on her shoulders. "You are sorry to leave me." He looked deep into her eyes, smiling face set in rather stern lines met by a slender figure in a dress of sheerest white and carrying a parasol which helped a drooping hat to shade a sensitive face, the eyes lit up like candles lighting the way to a glorious adventure.

"I've doffed my robes of toil for to-day, you see—all dressed up for the party, but I must not be late. I told Saikia to tell Mrs. Wynton I'd gone out with the Major Sahib."

They were soon in the city, surrounded by the smells and noise of the bazaar, the chatter of natives and the distant beat of a tom-tom, like a breaking heart.

"How absorbing the crowds are! I can imagine the mutiny happening in just such a place, and that distant tom-tom the rousing of the natives to action."

"We never know what it rouses. Ah! there is a man I have been looking for these last five weeks. Will you excuse me? Do not move from this spot on any account."

Speaking abruptly, Travice strode away through the crowded thoroughfare following what looked to Alison like a native in a bundle of dirty rags. As he drew nearer she saw the man turn and in surprise suddenly half raise his hand and as suddenly drop it as if caught in a salute unawares. In a moment they were deep in conversation and tired of watching them, she turned her attention to the scene about her. She was standing in the shadow of a sweet meat stall, out of the crowded glare of the centre of the bazaar where natives were passing and repassing, bargaining for different wares and exchanging the gossip of the day with chance met acquaintances.

She moved forward to drop a coin into the bowl of an old beggar squatted in front of the stall, staring with blind eyes at the passing crowds and passed on, her attention caught by a cunning workman, singing as he hammered at his brass. She attempted to bargain in the native dialect for a bowl worked in marvellous figures, but discovering that the few words she had acquired from Roddy and his ayah did not help her very much to understand the flow of language with which she was favoured in return, she hastily moved on up the street to get away from her too urgent bargainer. Drawn on by the fascinating sights, she found the way become narrower; the screened balconies overhead almost meeting. The crowd seemed to be growing more dense and suddenly remembering Travice's injunction not to move away from her sheltered spot, she turned about to retrace her steps, but discovered there had been a turn in the street and as she tried to go back the turn seemed to be blocked by brown faces. They seemed to have sprung from the earth itself, for Alison could not remember being in such a crowd before,—or was it only that the road was narrower? Her breath came a bit quick and she flushed as she tried to push by a tall native who blocked her way but somehow when he had moved aside with a deep bow she found another in his place and though he also stepped aside most deferentially, still there seemed others to fall in and suddenly she felt hemmed in by brown faces with dark eyes flashing under tall turbans. She drew her breath quickly and what Travice had said about the trouble brewing in the native quarter came to her mind and his hurried injunction to stay where she was. Her eyes grew dark with fear; she wished with all her heart that she had not left the sweet meat stall but she did not lower her head as she asked in her faltering Hindustanee to let her pass, but no way was opened and the crowd of brown faces seemed to draw nearer. At last her courage deserted her. She felt the ground rising and the faces blur when she saw Travice strike through the crowd, flinging them aside as if they were bits of clay. He reached her side and a strong arm was about her and a lined face bending close to her own. She hid her face on his shoulder shutting out the threatening faces and trembled uncontrollably.

"Steady," he said in a broken voice, "We must get out of here—don't let them know you are afraid," but his arm drew her nearer and she felt as if she never wanted to raise her head from that shoulder to face reality. But in a moment she was walking beside him, pushing his way through the crowd.

Soon they were in a quiet place beyond the gathering though they could hear the muttering of many voices.

"Don't turn around. I know of a hut down that alley you see where we will be safe. Walk slowly but if they should come on before we get there, run down that road beside the blind beggar and find the third hut under the arch to the right. Go in there—don't make a mistake, the third hut to the right. The man there will keep you safe."

"But you?" "I will get there some way, but wait for me. On no account leave until I come or someone comes for you. But I think it has blown over. We will get there all right."

Even as he spoke the sound of voices rushed towards them and he realized they were being overwhelmed. He took her hand one minute.

"Run child, I will hold them back until you are out of sight, but for God's sake run—the third hut to the right" and he turned to face the crowd of natives with his revolver drawn.

This gave Alison a chance to get away, and running madly through the natives in front, she turned down the narrow lane and panting, found the third hut under the arch and threw herself in. She found herself in darkness and only just in time. The wave of excited voices and running feet passed the low door as she lay crouching just inside, not daring to look out, not daring to think of what had happened to Tralice. She had heard a few shots and then the rush of voices and then silence but somehow she could not but believe that he would get the master hand.

As the light went she still lay there in fear and trembling, in the darkness. She heard no sound within so she judged the hut was untenanted and that she was alone. The voices outside gradually died away until the bazaar was deserted—but still she lay huddled against the wall, hardly daring to breathe and numb with the cold night air of the hills. At last she fell asleep, worn out with waiting and suspense.

Wakening suddenly to feel someone bending over her in the darkness, she put up her hands and they were held by two strong ones and she was drawn to her feet.

"Alison, are you all right?" It was Major Tralice, but she found no voice to answer. "Poor child, we can get away now—I could not get here before—those devils had me cornered. But we must go at once." He spoke jerkily, his voice unsteady.

To Alison, numbed with the cold and just awake, to hear this man's voice, whom a few days ago she had not known, and to know he was near again and his arm steadying her, was all her heaven; she had no thought beyond the moment.

He drew her towards the door. "There is no danger now—at least not as much," he added below his breath. "If we go down this side and keep in the shadow of the balconies we can reach the road farther down in safety. Then it is just a matter of walking. The mob has dispersed."

They walked hurriedly along and reached the road. Alison asked no questions—indeed it was enough for her that she was walking beside him, although he had hardly looked at her all the way along the road and had said very little. The night seemed filled with wonder, though they had just escaped she knew not what. She had no thought for the future until they drew near the bungalows and then for the first time it occurred to her—how they would have wondered at the house at her absence. She looked up at Major Tralice. His eyes had a hard look.

"If there is any unpleasantness with Mrs. Wynton about this affair, come to me," he jerked out. "You have had your adventure with a vengeance. It promised to be the last." He stopped in the road in front of the bungalow where all was dark. "Child, promise to come to me."

"Yes, I promise Major Tralice, but there will be no need when I explain."

He waited until she disappeared from view and then went on to his own bungalow.

Mrs. Wynton was waiting for her at the foot of the stairs. "What does this mean, Miss Markyate?" she said in a cold voice.

"I am very sorry, but when you hear what a dreadful time we have had I am sure you will wonder I got here at all." Her face was flushed and her eyes bright as she told of the mob in the bazaar and of taking shelter in the hut and Major Tralice's order to stay there as the only safe place.

"Your explanation sounds very plausible but unfortunately rather too melodramatic for modern India, and I regret to say that I cannot have as Roddy's governess a young lady who spends the night with a man of Major Tralice's reputation in a bazaar. It will be necessary for you to leave in the morning."

Alison went quite white, she shivered as with a cold wind, but the words which drummed in her ears over and over were not the order to go.

"Major Tralice's reputation! He is the soul of honour."

"Probably you would have me believe so, but I have heard tales of him for too long before you arrived on the scene, and the gossip of the Station for too long not to think differently." Mrs. Wynton felt that she had said enough. In fact she thought afterward she might have exaggerated a point somewhat. Although Tralice had never been among her retinue of admirers, he had been much sought after but had never glanced in anyone's direction—he had always seemed too bored. That this slip of a girl should have interested him was too much for her veracity. She went on.

"Besides, if you did not know of his reputation I should think you would not have wished to go rushing around the country with an engaged man."

"Engaged!" Alison's voice was very low.

"Why of course, anyone with half an eye could see he was wild about Betty Saunders."

"But engaged!"

"Well, I have been privileged to view the trousseau. But that is beside the question—as to you, we will be able to dispense with your services."

At the stricken look on the girl's face Mrs. Wynton felt she might have gone too far but she did not have an opportunity to retract her words, if she had so intended as Alison brushed by her without a word, out of the house. Not another minute could she stay under that roof. She stumbled blindly to the road, a tightening in her throat, her hands clenched and a dreadful pain in her heart. She could not see the road for tears but she turned to the hills and stumbled along, her one idea to get away from the pain of the thought that the man who seemed to have grown to fill her world, had all the time another face enshrined in his heart. She wanted to hide somewhere and if she could, die, but she there. She had left in a burst of temper and Mrs. Wynton had been certain that she had gone to Tralice's house.

When the bearer returned Tralice was having his breakfast on the verandah.

"The lady has gone, Sahib, and I was not able to deliver the note."

"Gone!" Tralice looked up hastily, "Gone where?"

"They do not know, Sahib. The Memsahib, she said she thought to the Sahib's bungalow."

"When did she go?" Tralice rapped out.

"Last night." The Hindoo grew pale as Tralice's face darkened. "Oh, Protector of the Poor, she was indeed gone. I could not deliver the note. See, I have brought it back safely."

But Tralice was not listening. He was staring out at the road. "She promised to come to me—just as I thought—Mrs. Wynton—but why had she not come? Gone and where?" He must find out.

But he would not be able to move for hours. He swore to himself as he realized his hands were tied for most of the day. There was to be an inspection of his troop of Lancers by a high official even then on his way to the parade ground and afterward he had to be shown around a mad thing and I was sure she had gone over to your place or I should have sent someone after her. You know, Major, it is not quite 'comme il faut' to keep a young lady out half the night, or rather all of it."

"But she explained about the mob?" he rapped out.

"Yes, of course—but—" Mrs. Wynton was getting rather confused. She had never seen Tralice's face so hard and she was not accustomed to hard looks from the male portion of the Station.

"Did she take any money and have you any idea where she went?"

"I am sure I do not know whether she had money or not—she went as she was—where I do not know, but since I am hardly the one responsible for her escape—ade, I wash my hands of the affair. Of course we will do all we can to find her," she added as she bethought herself that Major Tralice was her husband's senior in rank.

"If you have told me all, I have nothing more to ask you. I will find her. Tralice turned on his heel unceremoniously and strode out of the gate."

Find her, but where and why had she not come to him? He went back to his own place and had his horse saddled and was soon on the road. He decided that she would not have gone back to the town after her experience there, so he turned the other way, and galloped his horse toward the hills. Something seemed to tell him that he would find her there, if at all. So he rode on looking to right and left—it seemed such a hopeless search in that vast country but he never hesitated or doubted—he would find her. She could not have gone far. It was late afternoon when he had started and when he got into the foothills it was growing dark. He rode slowly up a steep incline—they had come down that way, that first day after their long walk. It ran along a deep precipice. What if she had fallen there—but he pressed on and came to the place where he had met her with Roddy, seated among the rocks—he would look here. He left his horse and felt his way across the rocks to the clump of bushes. It was quite dark now but the moon was out and he could see clearly enough, if he could only see her. As he rounded a great boulder, he came upon her asleep on the grass, her arm crumpled under her head, her face stained with tear marks. He bent quickly and gathered her into his arms. She opened her eyes and looked wide-eyed and sad into his face.

"Sweetheart, did you think you could run away from me?" His voice was husky but she struggled to free herself.

"No! No! Let me go, I beg of you."

"Do you think I will ever let you go, now I have found you?" and he held her closer to him.

Oh, the blessed peace of it, if but she could rest in those arms forever but he was engaged—he was playing with her. She lay quite still with her eyes closed, so still he wondered after all if he had made this great mistake—she did not love him perhaps, was only suffering him. He put her down suddenly at the thought. She should beg him on her knees before he would show his love again. They were all alike. He had lived so far without them—he would manage to carry on now.

"Evidently my attentions are unwelcome," he said stiffly, "I apologise, but it will be necessary for you to return with me. I cannot leave you here."

"But I cannot go back to Mrs. Wynton's—I could not!" she cried.

"Very well, you must come to my place, and I will get Mainwaring to put me up for the night. Ganda Singh will look after you, and I will have Mrs. Wynton send the ayah to keep you company."

"But I cannot!"

"There is no choice, Miss Markyate," he said formally, "If you do not come freely I will be obliged to carry you. As it is, it will be simpler for me to hold you on my horse. It is getting late and these hills are dangerous at night, especially after this outbreak." As he spoke he got on his horse, mounted and then bent to lift her in front of him. She offered no resistance and when she felt herself lifted on the horse and his arm like steel about her, she sighed a little and closed her eyes.

He bent over her, his breath on her cheek, "Are you comfortable?"

"Yes, thank you." That was the last they spoke until they had ridden

"THE WORK OF MEN'S HANDS"

"WE ought to get to understand the value of intelligent work, the work of men's hands guided by their brains, and to take that, though it be rough, rather than the unintelligent work of machines or slaves though it be delicate; to refuse altogether to use machine-made work unless where the nature of the thing compels it, or where the machine does what mere human suffering would otherwise have to do; to have a high standard of excellence in wares and not to accept make-shifts for the real thing, but rather to go without—to have no ornament merely for fashion's sake, but only because we really think it beautiful . . . to treat with the utmost care whatever of architecture and the like is left us of the times of art."

stumbled on in the half light and gradually she grew calmer. Her throat still ached and her eyes were dulled with pain but as she met one or two carts on their way to market and the drivers eyed her strangely, she tried to pull herself together and decide what she should do. She could not go on like this, in a strange country—but where to go? She would not go back though she had no money. She could not think but her steps took her towards the hills where she had walked with Roddy and where the Major Sahib had found them. As the day broke she threw herself down among the rocks and bushes far from the road.

MRS. Wynton left standing in the hall started to follow her and then with a shrug of her shoulders retired to her own room.

"Let her go—she will go to Tralice no doubt—we at least, are well rid of her."

But it was not quite to be so easily disposed of as Mrs. Wynton realized to her sorrow. About ten o'clock in the morning Major Tralice's bearer came around with a note for Miss Markyate and had to be informed that she was not and entertained—Tralice had been detailed to look after him and there was no way out.

So until he saw him off on his train, late in the afternoon, Tralice was obliged to keep beside his visitor, explaining and courteous, but inwardly sick with pain—where was she now? Finally he was at his own bungalow again, his eyes tired and restless. He gave directions to his man for the night, in case he should not return and left hurriedly for Mrs. Wynton's bungalow. He found her in the garden.

"Oh Major, Tralice, you are the very person I wanted to see. We thought perhaps you knew where Roddy's governess was but your bearer says no. She has given us so much trouble—we are worried to death, rushing off like this into dear knows where. These servants are impossible."

Tralice listened to her chatter with a steady look in his eyes.

"When did Miss Markyate leave?"

"Oh, last night, as soon as she got in, or rather this morning. I was waiting for her and when I told her we would not need her after to-day she rushed out like

SPIRITS

BY F. E. WILKES

Illustrated by M. H. Campbell

GRANNIE sat knitting and counting, for she was "narrowing." The firelight played on the flying needles, on the cut-steel buckles of her French-heeled slippers, on the jet comb that held her beautiful white hair, on the old fashioned rings that circled her nimble fingers.

A chill wind moaned up and down the street chasing the sodden leaves before it, piling them in little heaps and whirling them away as who should say: "Your day is done. You're dead. Lie there."

"Knit two, one over—there's the telephone. How tiresome! Ann," she called as the maid passed the door, "I'm engaged, and you don't know when I'll be free."

"Yes, m," said Ann.

"Unless, of course, it's Mrs. Peter. She didn't call when I was out, did she?"

"No, m," said Ann.

Grannie went on with her knitting. The truth was she was too troubled about Peter and Mrs. Peter to wish to see anyone. She wanted to study a case that she ought to be able to help on. What is experience for, if, after living out the greater part of your own life, you can't pass some of it on to your prettiest and dearest grand-daughter? But cases don't match. Husbands differ. Well, anyway, Pauline cared enough. She wasn't one of those girls who looked on marriage as an experiment, to be discarded if it was not all better with no worse about it. But Peter's worse was so needless, and—new. It was hard for Grannie to see Pauline tortured this way.

"It's Mrs. Peter, m. She's coming right over. I couldn't—" As Ann spoke the door-bell rang loudly, and before she could get to it, it rang again, louder.

A pretty, worried-looking, fair-haired girl entered impetuously with a nod to Ann and "Where's Grannie?"

"Well, Pollie, dear, I'm glad to see you," welcomed Grannie. "Knit two together, knit one—Sit down, love, that chair near the fire. I'll be through counting in a moment."

Her grand-daughter slipped out of her fur coat and threw herself into a low chair. Her white arms and shoulders gleamed through her filmy blue blouse and her fair hair shone like burnished brass beneath her rakish little hat. She sat with elbow on knee, chin in hand, gazing into the fire. Mrs. Ransome went on knitting and counting. Her needles clicked and her rings flashed, and while she was so occupied her bright, dark eyes took in the girl's woeful aspect.

Suddenly, without a word, Pauline buried her face in her hands and sobbed aloud. Grannie flung aside her knitting and snuggled into the big chair beside the weeping girl, drawing her close in her arms.

"Tell your own Grannie all about it," she crooned. "Grannie's own lamb! There, there, darling. The baby and Peter are alive and well, so it can't be so bad."

Pauline sobbed. "It's Peter. He's not well. He's drunk. It mightn't be so bad if he had smallpox, or—or—typhoid. He might get over that. But he's drunk all the time now. He and that hateful Bill Rutherford. I don't believe he'll ever be decent again. He has cases and cases of brandy and whiskey, and—and—all sorts of stuff. And so has Bill. And when they're not drinking at home they're drinking at Bill's. And Peter says if—if —I don't like it I can—Oh, my heart's broken! I wish I'd never married—"

"Now, now," Grannie interposed, "You know you're talking nonsense, and that you and Peter love each other. You mustn't count what he says when he's drunk. That's not Peter. Yes, I know the drunk part is bad enough, but it's not as bad as if he really didn't love you."

The girl dried her eyes and sat forward in the chair, her tear-washed face set and hard, her hands, clasping her wet ball of handkerchief, locked in her lap.

"Peter!" scornfully. "When I think of him the day we were married—and after—in his khaki, his head so high, the way he looked at me as Daddy and I came up the aisle—just as if he worshipped me. I thought there had never been a crusader so—so—noble. And now—"

"Just so," Grannie nodded. "Neither of you would listen to reason. Don't forget that we—your father and mother and I—tried to persuade you to wait, but you were as headstrong as Peter and determined to be married before he went overseas, and now when you both find out that neither is an angel nor a crusader—There, there," as Pauline broke again into bitter weeping, "I'll not say 'I told you so' again."

"But Peter didn't drink then. He never drank until—They say the country's improved, but what good does that do me if Peter simply takes to drink because he won't let a lot of old women, of both sexes, run him?" Pauline fired up inconsequently in defense of her man.

"When a man wants to drink one excuse is as good as another, and prohibition's a handy scarecrow to hang things on." Grannie was scornful, but she held the girl close in her arms.

"I know that horrid Bill—"

"Why call names?" Grannie interrupted. "I've no doubt Bill's wife is saying the same things about Peter, and with just as much reason."

Pauline sniffed indignantly and Grannie smiled to herself at the complete change of front.

THE two women leaned back in the big wing chair, their arms around each other, the silver and the golden heads resting against its blue cushions. The firelight flickered on shadowing walls, on bits of dark, polished wood and old brass, and searched out the colors in dim old rugs.

"I remember," mused Grannie aloud, "when your grandfather was made manager of the business for the middle west. It was a grand promotion for him, but we were practically exiled. The little town looked like nothing but a handful of chips scattered over the prairie, and the drunkenness among the men was appalling. It was loneliness, homesickness, lack of other interests that drove them to it. Each man should have fought the weakness in himself, but I was young, I'd been married only a short time, and I didn't understand. I blamed the other men, the west, the laws—everything but my husband. He had seemed so wonderful to me, like a Viking in his strength and courage. I'd have gone to the ends of the world with him, sure of his care and love."

Pauline glanced up at the portrait of this superman, smiling obscurely among the shadows from out his massive gold frame, and wondered absentmindedly if Vikings really wore side whiskers.

"I begged him to straighten up," Grannie went on, "but he would only fling away in a rage. He told me long afterwards that when he was drinking like that he didn't care anything about me—I was merely a nuisance."

"I'd have run away home."

"No, no, dear, you wouldn't. I'd promised for better or worse, just as you did, and I—loved him. I grew to hate the appointment that we had been so rejoiced to get, but when I talked of resigning it and taking our chance of getting another he was indignant. I used to pray for some opportunity to arise by which I could get him away before the habit was fastened hopelessly upon him, and one day it came."

"The inspector for the company arrived unexpectedly, coming straight to the "House instead of to the office. He was desperately tired, having been weeks traveling, going from one horrible little hotel to another, and admitted that he was about done for that day. I suspected that matters at the office were in worse shape than usual and I asked him to rest at the house while I went to get my husband. When I opened the office door, I saw that things were not only worse than usual but quite hopeless. Your grandfather and another man whom I particularly detested were seated at his desk, bottles and glasses between them, both absolutely, stupidly, drunk. They did not even know that I stood looking at them, and I turned away as furious as I was miserable. Then on the way back to the house I had—what do you young people call it?—a hunch. I made up my mind that I would save my husband no matter at what cost to us both, and I concocted the lie with which I hoped to do it. I told the inspector that my husband had gone away for the day, and I asked him to stay to dinner which he was only too glad to do. Then I prepared the best meal I knew how, and over it I told him that the climate didn't suit me and that I would have to go away for a part of each year at least, and that I dreaded leaving my husband alone because the climate didn't suit him either, and he needed my care. The inspector looked sharply at me over his coffee cup, but I looked steadily back, and made myself so agreeable that he stayed until very nearly his train-time. Then he said he might stop a minute at the office on his way to the station and see if it was open, and I didn't try to stop him. I knew that by that time they wouldn't know whether he was there or not. What he saw I don't know—he hadn't more than five minutes—but the very next week came an order transferring your grandfather to another post, not nearly so lucrative, but where he had plenty of work and quite different companionship. He only had the dimmest remembrance of the inspector's visit to the office, and never knew he had dined with me, but the shock of knowing that he had been caught in that condition, as well as the healthier environment, did what I had hoped for and he gradually abandoned the habit that was ruining both our lives.

"I don't advise telling lies in your case, my lamb," Grannie said, patting Pauline's hand. "I never believe in slavish imitation. But don't feel that everything is lost yet awhile. Wait till you have a 'hunch' to do something. Then, do it. If you watch your opportunity and think hard enough it will come, and in the meantime don't let your Peter think you are an enemy. Let him be quite sure you are his best friend—his pal."

The two women sat hand in hand while the dull day deepened into twilight and shadows crept into the room. Then Pauline rose and put on her coat.

"I must hurry," she said. "I'm going home to get Peter's favorite dinner. Beefsteak and onions, you know, and a lemon pie."

* * *

ALTHOUGH Grannie's story had roused in Pauline just what she had intended, the notion that her husband's reclamation rested mainly with her, the unhappy days went by and as yet the "hunch" so confidently predicted was not forthcoming. So long as Peter's stock of what he called "booze" remained, the situation, to Pauline, looked hopeless. She became obsessed with the idea of getting rid of it, and tortured her brain to produce some feasible scheme, hoping much from an enforced abstinence that would help him back to a reasoning frame of mind. But short of running amuck with an axe among the bottles and kegs she could devise nothing.

One night, restless and unhappy, she rose from her bed and wrapping herself in a kimono wandered downstairs to the living-room. There, crouching over the ashes in the fireplace she tried to conjure up that "hunch," but her mind seemed a chaos of disordered fancies and restlessness still drove her on. The cellar was where she must go! Down among those locked stores the hunch would come! She knew it as well as if she had been told.

Armed with the store-room key and a flash light she started down the cellar stairs, gathering her kimono closely around her and flapping heelless slippers on stockingless feet. Half way down she remembered the fat brown toad that made his home in the cellar, and she sat down quickly on the stairs. How could she go on at the risk of meeting him there all alone in the dead of night? But this was cowardice, unworthy of one following up a "hunch," so she continued her way and flapped hurriedly across the cellar floor, sure that the toad was hopping behind her bare heels, gaining on her with every hop. The storeroom would afford safety from him at least and she hurried inside, leaving the key in the lock and scrambling up on an empty box, tucked her feet under her.

There was little comfort to be gained from all those high piled stores but for some unaccountable reason the restlessness had left her. She felt that she was face to face with the enemy, and that her hunch was near—she was sure of that. She sat there hoping, wondering, trying to conjure up some scheme of action.

After a while she became conscious of slight sounds. They came from a nearby window outside the slatted wall of the store-room in which she sat. A jingle of breaking glass, a fumbling with the window catch, the scraping of a grudging sash being opened, a draught of cold air, muttered curses. Burglars! Were these stealthy sounds real? Or imaginary as on those many nights when Peter was out late and she listened with nerves taut magnifying every creak the slackening house gave forth? Had she conjured them out of her fears? But tonight she had no fear, only that intense desire to help rid her husband of the devil that possessed him, and a queer, illogical sense that the time had come.

Frozen with terror she yet had sufficient presence of mind to shut off her flash light, to creep noiselessly to the door, secure the key, but not daring to risk the noise of re-inserting and turning it, leaned her whole weight against the door and waited. Pauline had read about knees that trembled, always supposing the term a sort of author's license. She reflected in that awful moment that it was nothing of the sort. She wondered how long before hers would completely collapse.

"Well, let's get along. Nothin' here You'd best go first," a hoarse voice whispered.

"Let's look 'round here first."

"Rot. D'y'e think he'd keep it lyin' loose around here? It's sure to be somewhere upstairs, so what's the use of wastin' time? If we can't find it, let's wake him up and make him show us. I saw him comin' home about six o'clock, drunk's an owl."

Pauline ventured to peep through the nearest crack. What she saw was not reassuring. Two slouching, evil-looking men, caps pulled down, coat collars turned up, eyes glittering from behind bits of black cloth—as perfect a pair of stage villains as one could imagine. She shivered and drew back, trying desperately to keep her teeth from chattering; she fancied they could be heard a mile or so away. If only the door against which she leaned was locked! The door was solid and the lock good although the walls were slats.

"No," said the other voice, doggedly, "we'll look around here first. Seems to me—"

"D'y'e think y've come to spend the week-end? Come on, I say."

"What about that corner? It looks a likely place." The light playing over it made streaks of light and shadow run around Pauline like telegraph poles past an express train.

"That! I could bash that door in with one kick." Pauline's knees buckled and she sank in a heap behind it.

"Huh! I'd like to see ye. That door's solid, that is. I bet the lock's a—Say, did ye hear somethin' movin'?"

"Naw, I didn't. An' there aint no lock I can't open, neither. Aw, come on. We ain't got no time to be foolin' round here." The pair turned towards the stairs.

In one illuminating second the terrified eavesdropper in the store-room understood. These ruffians were her "hunch." They had come for Peter's booze. They were going to wake him and make him tell where it was kept. Peter was sleep-sodden and dazed, and her baby asleep in her crib. They were armed—she had caught the gleam of a pistol. This was what her prayers had invoked. Without thought for herself she sprang up and flung wide the door.

"Come back," she called. "It's here Here!"

The men whirled around. Pauline was perhaps as near death as she would ever come and escape his clutches. The bandit's search-light showed them a tall, pale figure against the dark doorway. With a long, white arm it beckoned.

"Come!" it commanded in low, vibrant tones. "The spirits are here."

There was an instant's silence. Then, uttering inarticulate howls, casting away torch and pistol, they leaped for the open window, snarling, fighting like two trapped animals as they jammed in its narrow space.

At sight of these unseemly struggles Pauline, in the reaction from her own terror, became mightily enraged. These two cowards to come disturbing her, and now they were making off, empty-handed. Not if she knew it! She caught hold of a squirming, kicking leg and pulled and pulled with all her strength. With the wail of a lost soul the owner, dragging his mate with him, dropped in a huddled heap to the floor. Pauline switched on her light and the pair grovelled as if expecting annihilation. Almost at her feet lay the discarded pistol.

"Get up," she said, and they shuffled to their feet. Cautiously, as if fearing to be forever blasted, one raised his head and looked from behind a sheltering arm. A long, incredulous stare, then—

"I'll be damned! 'Taint nothin' but a girl! Thought ye was a ghost, we did. Ha, ha! Guess we needn't have been so scared."

His friend's courage revived. He, too, raised his head—and looked into the muzzle of his own pistol.

"We don't mean no harm," he stammered. "We was just lookin' round."

"You came here to steal," Pauline accused.

"Only the boss's booze. We weren't goin' to tech another thing, s'help me."

"Well, I told you all the spirits are in there," pointing to the open doorway.

"Aw, quit yer foolin' 'bout sperrits. Ye can't scare us," truculently.

"It's you's the fool," growled his mate. "She means booze."

"Then why don't she talk Christian-like instead o' dodderin' about sperrits?"

"Listen to me," Pauline commanded. "The booze, as you call it, is in there and you—Oh," with sudden passion, "do, do take it, and be gone."

The men looked wonderingly at her and at each other.

"Say, what's yer game?" they questioned suspiciously.

"You'd best be quick," she cautioned, "for if my baby should wake and miss me she'll cry and rouse—" Pauline found herself addressing two backs. The men were peering into the storeroom.

"What d'y'e say about it?" queried they of each other. "As a 'bligement to the lady, ye know."

"Well,—to 'blige the lady. Say, ye'd best be careful how ye fool with that there pistol. I'll show ye how to hold it," advancing a step.

"Don't trouble. I know how," Pauline answered politely, raising her arm and pointing more or less steadily into his face.

Never was fair lady accorded such willing service. In an incredibly short time the wine cellar was cleared of all save a few empty boxes and bottles, the thieves following their last load of booty through the window with even less ostentation than they had come.

While the work was going on, Pauline bethought herself of Bill's stores. So long as they lasted, there was little hope for Peter's betterment.

"How fortunate," she said reflectively, surveying the almost empty shelves, "that it's all in such nice bottles and cases. Now, if it were Mr. Rutherford's—"

"And what like is his?" questioned her friends, deeply attentive, and both together.

"Oh, it's in a couple of big barrels. You couldn't move them, at least not—"

"Exactly so. Of course not," they chorused.

* * *

SILENCE fell upon the cellar. Silence except for a chill wind that blew in through the open window. Pauline with all the sensations of one "who treads along some banquet hall deserted" turned to go. The key and pistol dropped from her numbed fingers, and getting down on her hands and knees she groped for them. Something came hopping out from a dark corner into the small circle of light, something fat and brown: Pauline stifled a shriek and fled. At the stair's foot she paused. She must have that key. It would be evidence—. Holding her scant robes high, peering into the shadows, she picked her way back and secured it. Then terror, mad, stark terror, seized her and she ran, tripping over her kimono, tying herself up in its folds. Half way up the stairs she lost first one slipper—that must be found, she was no Cinderella—then the other. At last she shut and locked the door behind her at the stair's head and sunk almost fainting against it. While she crouched there the hall clock serenely chanted three. She had been gone scarce an hour.

After a while she crept up to her room, the stairs creaking at every step. Her baby slept, rosy and peaceful, and through an open door came well-regulated snores. She stumbled over a chair and the point of the rocker came back at her, catching her shin. The sleeper in the next room stirred.

"That you, Paul?" her husband drowsily demanded. "What's the matter?"

"N-n-nothing," nursing her bruised shin, "I—I thought I heard n-noises in the cellar."

"Oh, go to sleep. You're always hearing noises somewhere."

* * *

GRANNIE sat late over her breakfast, the morning paper propped before her after the fashion of those obliged to eat alone. When the telephone rang she jumped up nervously to answer it, instead of leaving it to Ann, who was slow in coming.

"Grannie, dear, do you believe in spirits?" Pauline's voice whispered excitedly.

"Well, dear, we're told to take a little wine for our—"

"Oh, not that kind. I mean—I'm sure I was led by the spirits down to the cellar last night, and, Grannie—are you there, Grannie?—Peter's been robbed of all his booze!"

"Pauline, what are you—"

"Every smidge of it! And Peter says he wishes he'd paid attention to me last night when I said I thought I heard noises. And he's promised to stop drinking, and he says I'm his own dearest, sweetest wife—"

"Pauline—"

"And, Grannie, didn't you feel just a weeny bit sneaky—that story you told, you know?"

"Yes, dear, but—"

"All Bill's booze is gone, too. They emptied the barrels and filled them with water! Doesn't it serve him right? He says someone must have told, because the barrels were labelled 'vinegar.' I always knew he was a hateful, suspicious—"

"Pauline, stop talking and tell me—"

"And the police are here. The house is full of them. They've found the pistol. They say it's a clue—"

"Pauline," Grannie at last broke in, "what are you taking about? Who robbed Peter? When?"

"Last night. I, and two men."

"What men?"

"Oh, I don't know. I didn't see their faces and they didn't talk much; but two nice men, and we're friends for ever."

"Pauline, you didn't rob—Hallo! hallo! Paul—"

"Number?" sang Central.

Whenever soap comes into contact with the skin—use Ivory.

Let his skin breathe

He's such a little fellow!

And, what happens to him now is so important.

The first thing a doctor tells a mother is, "Keep the baby clean. Bathe him and wash his clothes regularly every day with a pure, mild soap. This lets his delicate skin breathe, keeps it from chafing and allows him to get sound, health-giving sleep."

On specific recommendation by doctors, Ivory Soap has been used for babies for 43 years.

Ivory Soap is so pure and mild that it cannot harm the tenderest skin or the most delicate fabric. That is probably the reason why it is used for more purposes than any other soap in the world.

Ivory Soap has never been successfully imitated. There is no substitute for it today.

There are seven desirable properties that a thoroughly fine, homelike soap may have. Ivory has them all:

THE PLACE OF LITTLE EARS

LITTLE TIP, the black-capped chickadee, perched on the top rail of the fence that separates the garden from the wheat field. On most mornings Little Tip found plenty to do around the house, the orchard, and the barn, and, especially, about the hollow birch stub in which he made his home. Today, however, he had felt restless ever since sunrise, and had made up his mind that nothing short of a journey to the woods would make him feel satisfied again.

The chickadee looked slowly and carefully over and across the wheat-field, where the waving heads of grain were fast changing to the brown of ripeness.

"It looks like a long flight across that field," said Little Tip aloud. "I suppose, though, I can rest on the way and have a little lunch of ripe wheat, maybe."

"Ho! Ho! Ho!" came a buzzing laugh from a clump of red clover in the fence-corner below the chickadee. "That's the funniest thing I've heard since yesterday—a wheat-dinner for a chickadee. That sounds like what I heard Boy Dick say:

'Our dog has altered in his taste
From mutton-bones on grass to feast' "

Little Tip laughed too, and looked down at the speaker, who was none other than Master Humbumble, the very fuzzy, buzzy bumble bee.

"Just because I eat insects when I'm at home, is no reason why I should not eat something else when I go travelling," said Little Tip to the bee, who was sitting up on a bobbing flower-head of red clover.

"So you really mean to cross the field," said the bumblebee. "I will go along with you, and you couldn't have a better guide, especially if you wish to find clover-patches."

This suited the chickadee exactly, and he followed Master Humbumble, who buzzed away in a slanting direction across the field.

"Whir-r-r!" Little Tip dropped quickly into the shelter of the uncut wheat. The bumblebee had dropped too, and as soon as he could get his breath, the chickadee asked: "What noise was that?"

"Was that why you stopped?" asked the bumblebee. "The chap who made that whirring noise is telling you who he is, right now. Listen!"

A clear, full call sounded just overhead— "Seeyou—seer."

"Oh, it's only Master Seeyou, the meadowlark," said the chickadee.

"Who did you think it was?" asked the bumblebee.

"I thought it might be a new kind of hawk," said Little Tip.

When the bee and the bird rose again, the meadowlark was not far above the waving wheat, but they continued their journey without waiting to speak to him.

Squeaks and squeaks sounded a little over to their right. The wheat had been cut in this part of the field, and the bound sheaves stood in stooks. It was from one of these that the squealing and squeaking seemed to come. Little Tip wanted to know what all the noise was about, and he soon found out.

Bobbin, the quail, was marching around the wheat-stook, walking with short, fast steps, but pausing often, and jerking at something with his bill.

Bobbin was a friend of Little Tip's, and the chickadee began asking questions at once:

"What is all the noise about, Bobbin? Have you got a little pig in that wheat-stook?"

"More than one little pig, and they are all meadow-mice," answered the quail.

The bumblebee was laughing so hard that it was with difficulty he kept from falling off his perch on a piece of wheat stubble. He was pointing close to the ground, and toward the edge of the wheat sheaves. Then the chickadee saw what caused the squeaks and squeals. As Bobbin marched around, he would watch for a little mouse-tail wriggling out from amongst the wheat, then he would pinch it.

This didn't seem altogether fair to the chickadee, so, when Bobbin stopped his march for a moment, Little Tip said:

"Come out. Bobbin won't hurt you," and seven little mouse-noses showed themselves.

"There are plenty of wheat-stooks for everyone," said Little Tip to the meadow-mice. "You take the next one, and Bobbin won't disturb you, for he will have this one all to himself."

"How do you know he won't disturb us?" asked the meadow-mice.

Little Tip hadn't thought of that, and he was troubled when he saw the mischief in Bobbin's eyes.

"He won't bother you," said the bumblebee "for I'm going to stay here and keep watch."

hiding in a wheat sheaf, and his little cheeks were puffed out as if he had the mumps or a very bad toothache. "Chattle-chub," said Saucebox again, and when he saw the chickadee did not understand him, he put a front paw in his mouth, bringing it out full of wheat grains.

The chipmunk then ran to the woods, which was not far distant and returned even more quickly. His cheeks were no longer puffed out, and the chickadee could understand every word when Saucebox said:

"You can't do that, Master Tip; and a bear can't do it, nor a mud-turtle. I'm the only one in the wheat-field who can carry such a big, big mouthful at a time."

Without another word, the chipmunk began filling up his cheek-pouches with

Herring Gull and Nest

The seven little meadow-mice looked carefully around to see if any enemies were near, and then scampered through the stubble to a nearby stook.

The bumblebee had found a small patch of white clover, and Bobbin, the quail, busied himself searching for the fallen grain.

"Chattle-chub, chattle-chub," said someone, as if trying to talk. It sounded as if the speaker had his mouth full of bread-crumbs.

Little Tip was curious again, and he darted here and there among the stooks until he found who had spoken.

Saucebox, the chipmunk, was half wheat again, and the chickadee joined a small flock of birds who were sitting in a row on the fence between the wheat-field and the woods. Darky Dan, the blackbird, was there, Coalie Crow, and others of his family, and the chickadee knew that each one had come to feast on the wheat. They talked of nothing but wheat, and paid no attention to Little Tip, who could see no fun in that sort of thing, but began to feel hungry for the insects that he knew were to be found in the trees at the far side of the wheat-field.

A short flight brought him back again to where he had left the bumblebee, but that buzzing fellow had gone to some other clover-patch. Not a quail nor meadow-mouse was to be seen, which was a strange thing, thought the chickadee.

He listened for the whirr of the meadowlark's wings, but could not hear it. He flew on until he was but a short distance from the garden-fence, and, perching upon a scarecrow, he listened again. It seemed to him that everyone in the wheat-field was listening for something too. Happening to look upward, the chickadee saw the reason why all the Little People of the field were so quiet.

Above the wheat-field, circled Ketch-Katch, the red-tailed hawk, and with every bit of strength he had, the chickadee flew homeward to the shelter of the trees within the garden-fence. Here, in safety, he slowly shook his little, black-capped head, and said to himself:

They stop, and look, then listen,
At every sound each hears.
'Tis true, the summer wheat-field
Is the Place of Little Ears.
A fine place for a journey,
With lots to see and do,
Where all the Little People
Are glad to talk with you.
Within its fenced-in borders,
North, South, and East, and West,
The fun is mixed with danger,
So I like home the best.

GIFTS FROM SOME TREES

WITH September, the first month of Autumn, there will come to many of us thoughts of and perhaps plans for nutting-time. We have our favorite woods to go to and our favorite trees too, which are of course those that bear the nuts we go in search of. We single out but a few trees for our appreciation: the chestnut, the beech, walnut, hickory and butternut and give but little thought to those others that do not yield seeds to our taste.

Oh I agree with every one of you that "nut-trees" are the finest kind in Autumn, but in interest all the other trees are not to be despised.

It is a little early yet I think for nuts, excepting beech-nuts, so we can find time to consider what those other trees yield in place of the nuts we are fond of.

To most of us, the most familiar tree-seed is that of the maple that is most noticeable when green and hanging in drooping clusters on the branches. In this state the two-lobed, two winged pairs of seeds fall to the ground and only a few of them remain on the parent branches and ripen there. The seed coverings become hard and brown, the wings light and brittle and the strong winds of Autumn wrench them from the parent tree scattering them broadcast some few to find a foothold, the beginning of the life of another maple tree.

Already the leaves on that grand old elm have begun to fall. No use to look for nuts there and when we search for seeds on the branches a surprise awaits us—there are no seeds at all. In earliest spring the tree has blossomed, the seeds have grown flat, wrinkled seeds with winged margins and fringed edges suspended from the twigs on slender threads. Small wonder is it that we find none in September.

Every oak is a "cup and saucer" tree, and all of us have hollowed out the acorns and set them in their little holders. We might call the oak that bears sweet acorns real "nut-trees," but the squirrels, and others of the woodland people do not scorn the bitter acorns as we do.

There isn't a sweeter nut to be found than that hard-shell, the hickory-nut. When it ripens its smooth, seamed overcoat is easily removed, but none but a squirrel would attempt, with his teeth, to crack the inner shell. When you succeed in cracking it the sweetness of the nut-meat repays you for all your trouble.

The chestnut, if we had always to pick it from the branches, would be more appreciated than it is. Like the three-angled beech-nut its rough prickly coat opens by itself, dropping the thin-shelled nuts as if the tree knew we waited below to gather them.

Horse chestnuts, buckeyes and their fruit are known to everyone, especially to boys when the green globes swell on the branches, lose no time in stripping the outer covering to get the rich brown nuts that soon make bulging pockets.

the drowning do not pause to contemplate the quality of the spar flung to them.

Mrs. Lafone looked vindictively at Kitty and then turned a watchful glance at the door. She wondered how soon and in what circumstances Kitty's dearest friend, who was not received at Court, might make her appearance? However Kitty might strive to hide the visit, Mrs. Lafone would take care that it should be known of; she had but to whisper the fact to my Lady Verney and she did not doubt that the Royal occupants of Fauconberg Hall would promptly be in possession of the damning fact. Other people could put spokes in wheels besides my Lady Kilcroney; and the more swiftly they were rolling to favour, the greater might be the upset!

Her Majesty, talking very affably to Kitty, had advanced towards the counter where the waters were distributed. Here divers magnates of the town were awaiting her, whom the Comptroller of the Household, my Lord Courtown, named to her, one after the other. Kitty and her group of ladies were left thus for the moment outside the Royal circle of attention. The hall by this time contained a certain amount of curious spectators, very respectfully aligned against the walls, for the public of Cheltenham, genteel quiet folk, would have died rather than presume on Her Majesty's condescending informality.

"Pray," said the Queen, to Mr. Clark, the town doctor, "let me have a taste of the water, sir, to drink which the King has been sent hither. I ought at least to know," she added archly, "to what penance he hath been condemned."

She sipped and declared she had expected worse; Princess Royal and Princess Augustus also sipped, but they cried out and protested that they were sorry for dear papa. And while the Royal pleasantries were producing the most exquisite if refined mirth throughout the whole assembly, Mrs. Lafone, who had been conscious that she was the object of considerable interest to one of the equerries (indeed, he was lifting his quizzing glass to mark his notice), perceived his glance wander from herself and become fixed. He dropped his quizzing glass, the better to see; a warmth of admiration, prodigiously different from the familiar ogle she had herself evoked, wrote itself on his countenance. But for the presence of Royalty, she thought he might have exclaimed out loud. Molly's glance promptly followed his. She could hardly believe her eyes. Here was fate playing her game with a vengeance. Her enemy was delivered into her hands. Every one knew the face of Rachel Peace!

My Lady Mandeville advanced, clad, like Kitty herself, in white, but with a flutter of grey ribbons here and there to mark her Quaker preference. Her delicate pale face was faintly flushed, under the wide brim of her simple hat. She was not less fair than the pearls at her throat, nor less shining in delicate beauty. She held by the hand a noble boy, slightly older than little Denis, who marched as if the place belonged to him and gazed about under frowning brows as though he wondered who dared occupy it without his permission.

If Kitty made a charming picture with her little son, Rachel, with the heir of Mandeville, graceful and gracious, with a lovely tenderness emanating from her, was the very embodiment of sweet motherhood.

She came across the wide hall with swift step, looking from right to left, a smile hovering on her lips, her seeking eyes already lit with fond pleasure. Where was her dear Kitty? Suddenly she stopped—the smile faded, the light of the expectant gaze went out, shadow fell upon her radiance, a flutter as of fear shook her; yet she had but encountered the gaze of my Lady Verney. Susan Verney, who was very well acquainted with Rachel Mandeville, who had indeed also tasted of her hospitality, both in town and in the country, now withered her with a blasting stare of degeneration, a stare which said: "My Lady Mandeville, I am pure virtue to-day, I do not know you."

The room was all eyes to look at Rachel, and though so decorous it was all whispers.

The next moment the poor thing saw the Queen and the Princesses, and Kitty Kilcroney white as death and good Lady Flora scarlet in the face; she saw and understood. Motionless she strove to rally her courage. She wanted strength of heart and clearness of mind to do just what would be right; Quaker Rachel who had never done wrong but once! And for that breathless moment, unknown to herself, her eyes hung on Kitty's face; and Kitty's eyelids were cast down.

The little Viscount Impington tugged at her hand. His was an impatient spirit.

"Come on, Mamma," cried he, in loud authority; and at the same moment little Denis O'Hara raised a piping cry: "Imp, Imp, Imp!" and tearing himself from the maternal clasp, galloped across the room to hurl himself upon his baby comrade.

The Queen looked at Kitty with an air of profound surprise and disapproval, and Kitty looked back at the Queen. And her heart rose within her; for, with all her foibles and fancies, she had a heart.

It led her then to do the noblest act of her whole existence.

Holding herself very erect and moving with a beautiful dignity, she slowly backed the length of the room that divided her from Rachel Mandeville; and, keeping her eyes on the Royal face the while, she took her friend by the hand. Then she stood very upright and waited. Rachel could do naught else but wait too.

In the dead silence the Queen prepared to take her departure.

Little Mr. O'Hara and my Lord Impington were beginning to show signs of following up their affectionate greeting with a rough-and-tumble fight and each mother had to take possession of her child and keep him firmly held; but they kept tighter hold of each other still.

The Royal group advanced; the kindly young Princesses with awed looks, as if they felt how ill things were going without understanding. When she reached my Lady Kilcroney and her friend, Queen Charlotte paused and seemed to hesitate. She cast a strange troubled glance at the two young women, and Kitty and Rachel fell, still clasping hands, into a great curtsy. And the question was, which of the two made it with a nobler grace.

The last of the equerries to follow looked back at the door, and saw my Ladies Mandeville and Kilcroney embracing and kissing and he thought they were both in tears.

My Lord Kilcroney had been among those who unobtrusively joined the lookers-on in the pump room during the Royal visitation, and, beholding the scene, his own eyes filled. In the effort to regain his self-control he turned his dimmed gaze away from the two who enfolded each other in such affecting and unaffected friendship and it fell upon Mistress Lafone. As awhile ago his son and heir, he was fascinated by the expression on the small pale visage. Molly caught his riveted glance, wilted beneath it, and somehow vanished. Not my Lord Kilcroney nor anyone could ever as much as guess at her share in the morning's business; yet so does conscience make cowards of us all, as Mr. Shakespeare has it.

My Lord kissed his wife's hand before most respectfully saluting that of my Lady Mandeville. At sight of him, Kitty mingled laughter with her tears.

"Is it not delightful, Denis," cried she, "that our sweet Rachel should have had this happy thought? But, oh, my dear love, our little rascals are at fisticuffs again!"

"My dear Kitty," wrote Lady Florence that evening, in a letter brought round from Fauconberg Hall by one of the pages in waiting, "I thought you were dished, I did indeed. And of all the odd tiresome contretemps, my love! Well, I have not time to say even a word of what I felt: Her Majesty is not fond of audacities and you did, dearest Kitty, the most audacious deed. . . Well, never mind again!

"'Twas your hat did the trick to begin with, my love; you was always so clever about clothes, Kitty. Sure, it was the finest inspiration to wear that modest country straw with its plain ribbon. It caught Her Majesty's eye from the first moment, and that you know means so much. So modest, sensible and quiet you showed beside poor Susan! Susan, with that tow-row of feathers on her head! 'Tis she who is dished after all: 'A loud young woman,' says the Queen to me. 'I do not approve of Lady Verney's style.' And what must she do on the top of it but present herself in my parlour at Fauconberg Hall this very afternoon?—a vast piece of presumption, since the Queen hath forbidden visitors to all and sundry!—And wants an interview of Her Majesty, to apologise—prithree, Kitty, think of it!—for Her Majesty's having been exposed to such a meeting. She, to apologise for the town! She, to cast her stone at poor Rachel! I have never known my Royal so angry! 'Are you then not acquainted with my Lady Mandeville?' She asks our Verney. You should have seen Susan's face under her red plumes. (I had taken good care Her Majesty should know we all were.) To be brief, Kitty, Verney went forth with her comb considerably cut, and Her Majesty took a twist in the other direction and spoke very kind to me; though regretting the incident, she said she could not find too grave a fault with a display of loyalty. 'Tell my Lady Kilcroney,' she says, 'that about My Person I appreciate loyalty!'

Denis Kilcroney heard the contents of this missive with a grave countenance. Then, looking at his wife's charming face, all irradiated between the joys of her good conscience and its unexpected reward, he exclaimed generously that it was a proud day for the House of O'Hara. "Though," he added, "the proudest moment of it all was when I saw you stand by your friend, me darling girl!"

CHAPTER II

IN WHICH MISS PAMELA POUNCE IS ORDERED TO PACK

PAMELA POUNCE sat with a bunch of cowslips in one hand and the lid of the ribbon box in the other; she had fallen into a profound muse.

It was the cowslips, though they were but artifice, which had set her active brain thus suddenly and idly day dreaming. They had brought her back with a rush to the old farm where she had been born and brought up. The whole surroundings of her exile had vanished. She was no longer in the big, bare, stuffy, untidy workroom at the back of Madame Eglantine's celebrated Paris hat shop; in the centre of snippets and straws, feathers, fringes, flowers and other fashionable fripperies; under the glare of the skylight; with the patter and gabble of French voices, the click of scissors, the long-drawn sighs or quick pants of energetic stitching, the rustle of crumpled silks, in her ears, and in her nostrils the indescribable atmosphere of the atelier, as it was called. An apartment hermetically sealed to the outer airs, save what might penetrate of them through the opening of its doors; redolent of the gums of artificial flowers, of last year's and this morning's succulent cookery—Monsieur Ildefonse, the husband of Madame Eglantine, liked a point of garlic in most dishes—and of the faint sickly scents of hair powder and fine lady's perfumes which hung about the whole establishment. There were other odours in the workroom besides, of which the less said the better. It was little wonder that Pamela Pounce should now and again feel her splendid vitality slacken; that she should have considerably fined down from a country buxomness since she had joined Madame Eglantine's staff.

But the bunch of cowslips had brought her away—far away from it all for a blissful moment.

She was back again at home. The exquisite freshness of an early summer morning on the Kentish downs encompassed her. Her young bosom lifted with ecstasy. Oh! the breath of England: pungent of the sea, sweet of the moorland, free from the hills and whispering of the woods, was there ever anything like it? There was a fragrance of bread-making too from mother's oven, and a lovely reek of burning weeds where father was busy over the potato fields!

Pamela started. A voice, sharp as a pen-knife, had recalled her to reality.

"Ah, Meess"—she went by no other name in this French servitude, either from her employer or her sister workers. It was an unconscious tribute to a certain fine apartness of character, as well as to her British independence. "Ah, Meess," cried Madame Eglantine, "is this how I find you? Asleep with your eyes open! My faith, is this how you conduct yourself in the thick of the business hours? And the Marquise who expects that hat by noon!"

Pamela opened her day-dreaming eyes full upon the speaker, gave an inaudible sigh and a small ironic smile. She did not start or blush or show any sign either of flurry or vexation at the acrid accent of the rebuke, she was too completely mistress of herself for that. Her hand hovered over the ribbon box; then with a decisive movement she nipped a shimmering purple roll and began to draw out its darkly radiant lengths.

"Purple!" ejaculated Madame Eglantine, surprised into a quiet amiable tone; "purple for that blonde Marquise who is not yet twenty! And she means to wear all white muslins with lace in floods. Did I not tell you so? That ribbon—bought for Madame la Gouvernante—it is for dowagers—"

She broke off and stared.

Pamela had twisted and snipped and pinched and the hat was trimmed in what her famous patronne herself would have described as "un tour de main." She now held it up on her balled hand, and turned it slowly from side to side.

"But it is a stroke of genius!" exclaimed the little Frenchwoman. She hated Pamela, but she was above all an artist. "No, no, do not touch it again, no one must touch it! You have a thousand times reason. Blue or green or pink—anyone with the ordinary mind would have blended me the banal pretty-pretty with those cowslips. The Marquise would have been but one of a score of shepherdesses, no more distinguished than a dragée box for a baptism! But now—"

She paused and waved her hands before the delight of the mental picture. A small, dusky woman with very bright eyes and extraordinarily swift movements, she was like some quick furry animal of the mouse tribe; a greater contrast to the fair, large, composed English girl could hardly be imagined; yet on one point these two were singularly akin. Both were geniuses in the same restricted yet fascinating realm of art.

If there were a creature on earth capable of stepping straight off into the shoes of Madame Eglantine, first milliner in the world of Fashion, it was Pamela Pounce, the British yeoman's daughter!

Perhaps it was this consciousness of her rival's merits which made the Frenchwoman, while too acute of intellect not to recognise them, regard her clever apprentice with feelings which approached detestation. Yet she was soon to find another cause.

"I'd better put in the stitches myself, I suppose, M'dame!" said Pamela tranquilly. She spoke French fluently by this time, with a pronounced if not displeasing British accentuation. "The young ladies are so fond of sewing things to death. It's like a hand on pastry," she went on meditatively, as she bit her thread, and flung a cool, tantalising glance at the irate ring of countenances about her. "You have, or you haven't got it, and no one to blame."

"That will do, Meess. There is too much conversation here, Mademoiselle Panache!" Madame hopped spitefully from Pamela upon the directress, who, sitting large, square and sallow at the

The Surrender of Richard Tralice

into the courtyard and she found herself lifted down from the horse and as if in a dream, led into the house.

Tralice called Ganda Singh and told him to prepare his own room for her and gave directions to get her something hot to drink and some food. He then turned to Alison where she had sunk down on a reed chair by his desk, her head on her hand.

"I will say good night, Miss Markyate. Ganda Singh will see that you have everything and do not hesitate to ask for anything he may forget. Good night."

She sprang up and caught his arm. "Oh, but do not leave me alone here! I cannot stay alone!"

His look softened as he put his hand over hers. "Sweetheart—" But he got no further. She drew her hand away and turned from him.

"I am sorry, Major Tralice. It was just for a moment, I will not feel strange in a little while, and I will not need you."

At that he straightened, clicked his heels together, saluted and turning, strode out of the room.

Alison turned slowly and dropped in the chair again, her head on her arm, too tired and cold to think, only longing to rest. She lay there until someone came in and touched her shoulder. It was Roddy's ayah with some steaming soup on a tray.

"If Missy will eat this, she will feel better." She put the tray down before her.

"Thank you, Saiki," Alison took the soup mechanically and shivered less.

"Will Missy come to her room, and Saiki will make her nice and warm?"

Alison rose and followed her slowly upstairs. She was led into a large richly furnished room and made comfortable for the night. She was deep asleep in a moment, like a tired child, drowned in oceans of sleep.

It was broad daylight when she awakened at last and looked about her at the strange surroundings. This was his room. It all came back to her and she shut her eyes. Here she was, with nothing, no shelter whatever if it had not been for him—and his heart in someone else's keeping. She felt he could not but know that was the unbearable part. It was all unbearable, her foolishness in coming to India above all.

She turned her eyes to the door as the ayah came in to tell her the Sahib was below and would speak with her.

When she came down stairs slowly Tralice was in the large living room pacing restlessly back and forth. His brows were dark and he had the old bitter look. He did not wait for her to speak but began formally.

"I have made all arrangements for your passage home to England and your journey to Bombay. It will not be possible to leave until this evening but if you will do me the honour of making yourself comfortable here I will consider it a favour. Your train does not leave until tonight. Ganda Singh will drive you to the station and he will see that you have everything to-day. I have arranged with Mrs. Wynton to have your trunks brought over this morning."

"You are very kind." He did not wait to hear any more but bade her good morning and departed.

Alison seemed in a daze. The aching pain in her heart seemed to numb her faculties. She could not think of the journey home, glad only that she had not to think of the details. It would come later; she would have to think of how she was to repay Tralice but not now. She was sitting at the Major's desk, her hand shading her eyes, tear dimmed, gazing out on the garden when Saiki came in to ask if she would have her breakfast in there.

"Yes, Saiki, bring it to me here."

She looked about and saw the great airy room for the first time. It was very masculine, severe in its arrangement but at one end was a grand piano. However, most of the frivolous evidences of a woman's domain had been put out of sight when Tralice took on the house and had been replaced by his hunt trophies; antlers etc., his guns and soft tiger skins on the floor—an old coat here, a riding whip there. She looked about as she had her breakfast. "It only needs flowers," she said out loud, and after Saiki had taken the tray away she wandered to the garden and gathered great clumps of tropical flowers and some of the brave little English blossoms planted by exiles far from "Home"—pansies and forget-me-nots and mignonette. She spent the morning in arranging them about the room and in repacking her trunks. The weary day dragged itself through at last and Alison was finally dressed ready for her journey, as the light was failing. Again the hills were in a haze; she could see them from the window and as she turned to look at them a last time, she heard Tralice's voice on the verandah, giving his final orders about her trunks. She stood with her back to the window steadying herself by the desk. His face had a drawn look as he came into the room.

"Miss Markyate, I believe everything is satisfactorily arranged. I hope you will be able to forget the unfortunate time you have had in India. There is nothing more I believe, except to bid you good-bye and to say I am indeed sorry that all this has happened."

He waited, and as she said nothing, bowed stiffly and turned away. After a few final directions to Ganda Singh he went off. Alison could hear his footsteps die away as she stood motionless where she was.

This was the last then: she looked about at this room, his room—everything spoke to her of him, of his lean dark face and quick look; his desk where he wrote, his books and guns and his coat over the chair. He had worn it perhaps yesterday, or the day before when he had come for her in the hut. She felt the sobs rise in her throat, aching, tearing sobs. She dropped into the chair and buried her face in his coat.

"Oh, I cannot bear it, I cannot indeed," and she sobbed as if her heart would break.

Suddenly she looked up. Tralice was standing in the doorway, silhouetted against the waning light. She could not see his face, as she stood up, quickly brushing the tears from her eyes.

"It is just nervousness, and the journey and I must be sorry to leave India after all." She tried bravely to check her sobs.

He came across the room and put his hands on her shoulders.

"You are sorry to leave me." He looked deep into her eyes, smiling. She could only shake her head but he drew her to him fiercely and though she struggled to free herself, he held her in a grip of steel and turning her face up to his covered it with kisses.

He laughed down at her. "Child, child, do you think I will let Love go—now that I have found it?"

"But Betty Saunders?" she said between her sobs.

"Well, what of Betty Saunders?"

"But you are engaged to her!"

He laughed down into her tear-filled eyes.

"Sweetheart, so that was it. I never was engaged to Betty Saunders, but I am very much engaged now." And he bent to kiss the eyes that shone up at him like stars through the rain.

At Seven O'Clock

BY J. MORTON LEWIS

MRS. Grange sat in a chair before the fire. Her chin was resting on her palms, and there was a far-away look in her eyes as she stared at the flames as if trying to read some personal message from them. She had arrived at a cross-road in her life and the time had come for her to choose.

She mentally reviewed her past. For five years she had been married to Charles Grange; five uneventful, monotonous years in which she had to a certain extent been happy. She had been happy as hundreds of other women are, in the possession of all she required and a husband who allowed her freedom from worry and a comfortable dress allowance. Nine months before she had met Dr. Musgrave, a young medical man, who had just arrived in the district to work up a practice. He was young and good-looking, the nice, masterful sort of man who by dint of hard work and personal influence can push his way anywhere. He had become very popular; men liked him and their womenfolk made a vogue of him. His practice grew rapidly and he became a social acquisition. He came often to the Granges to dine. Mrs. Grange had felt herself drawn towards him. There was some vibrant chord in her being which responded to his presence. She found herself looking forward with an undue eagerness to his visits until the day when they stood together in that drawing room soul to soul.

She shut her eyes for a moment. The scene came back so vividly. He had stood just there on the rug calling upon her by name; he had taken her hands in his and drawn her towards him. Then he had told her, and much as she had tried to deny it her love had responded. It had shown itself on her face, by her every action as much as the unspoken word.

Now the moment for her to choose had come. On the one hand, husband, home; on the other, divorce, which every nice woman finds in horror, and the man she loved.

She was still thinking it out when the door opened and Dr. Musgrave entered. He came towards her with hands outstretched.

"Muriel."

She rose and put her hands in his. For a moment his eyes rested on hers, then he drew her towards him. With a little cry of pleasure, of self-renunciation, her head sank on his shoulder.

"Muriel," he said, "when is it to be? We cannot go on like this. It is self-torture to both of us. Come away with me now—to-night—this moment. I have a car waiting."

She smiled at his impetuosity. "Have you thought what it means?" she said. "You have built yourself a practice here. You must give all that up. You will have to go away somewhere and start afresh."

"With you, Muriel. I have been awake night after night, sat up thrashing it out in my own mind. My practice, everything must go, because on the other hand there is you. Don't you understand what you are to me? It has cost me no small pangs to act as I must do towards your husband. I feel a traitor."

"Then why do it?" Though she would not have acknowledged it, she hung on his answer.

"Because neither you nor I will ever know happiness again apart. Because we love one another. You, as you never loved your husband—I, as I have never loved any woman. Muriel, you'll come?"

She looked into his face. "You'll be good to me—always?"

"Always." She felt his arm tighten around her. "Don't you realise all that you are to me?"

"Then I'll come." She was glad now that the decision had been made—that she had given herself to him.

"To-night?"

"No; give me until to-morrow. I shall have so much to see to." She felt she wanted a last evening in the home she had known for five years.

"To-morrow evening at seven o'clock I'll have the car here, and we'll be in London and away to Paris by the eight o'clock train." He bent down and kissed her, the reverent kiss of a man who understands and appreciates to the full all that it means to a woman.

Mrs. Grange was still sitting in the firelight when her husband entered. Naturally of a phlegmatic disposition, he was more than usually tired as he flung himself down in a chair opposite hers. He was also growing a little stout, and he had been through a wearying, harassing day in the City. Mentally she compared the two men, and a wave of thankfulness at her decision swept through her. She remembered it all afterwards.

"Well, Muriel," he said, "been busy to-day?"

"No," she replied listlessly. "And you?"

He sank a little further into the depths of the chair. "I'm tired out. Things are so abominably oppressive in town. Money's tight and men are afraid to do anything."

"You look tired." She spoke more for the sake of saying something.

"I am tired out." He took out his case and lighted a cigarette. "Dinner?"

"At seven-thirty—as usual. You're early to-night."

"Yes; I'm afraid I shall be late to-morrow though—I've got a man coming up whom I want to take to the club. It's big business if I can pull it off."

She felt herself blush guiltily. She remembered she had hated the club when they were first married. It had been the cause of their first big quarrel. Charles was too phlegmatic to quarrel. Now she was thankful for its existence.

"It's extraordinary how an evening at the club helps business along," said Grange.

"I suppose so," she replied.

He laughed. "You remember how you used to hate it at first. The tiffs we used to have about it." Grange rose and putting his arm round her shoulder kissed her. "It's made us a good many hundreds, little woman." She wondered as to the cause for this unusual demonstration of affection.

"I'll go up and get ready for dinner, I think," he said.

"What time is it?"

"About quarter-past seven."

"Good gracious!" She rose. It was as she stood in the firelight that she realized. It was their last dinner together. A quarter-past seven. Next evening at that time she would have left and be speeding towards London with another man, the man with whom she had chosen to spend the rest of her life.

The evening seemed to drag; dinner was interminable to Mrs. Grange. It was not altogether that she wanted the last few hours past, but she wanted to be alone. She felt moreover a sense of guilt in the presence of her husband. Her mind was a chaos. Thoughts of the man with whom she was leaving on the morrow were suddenly broken by some chance word by her husband. Her love for Dr. Musgrave had not abated one whit, but it was deadened for the while as she sat in the presence of her husband, who within a few hours she would wrong with the greatest wrong a woman can do a man.

Once the telephone bell rang, and she started, afraid lest it should be Dr. Musgrave. She listened in an agony while her husband spoke. "Who was it?" she asked when he returned, and her lips went dry.

"A friend of yours."

"Of mine?" She tried to meet his gaze.

"This,"
said the shrewd detective,
"is an inside job"

"I know," said the man from Headquarters, "how friendly everybody around the place seemed to be—but somebody who was in your confidence got away with your valuables, just the same."

How often it is, that when health is gone, "something that was in your confidence got away with the valuables."

Coffee often robs its users of health, as any doctor can tell you. Sleeplessness, nervousness, high blood-pressure, indigestion, and a general loss of efficiency have brought many people to the discovery that their supposed friend, coffee, has robbed them under cover of friendship.

Making Your Hair Improve Your Looks

How to Make Your Hair Make You More Attractive

EVERYWHERE you go your hair is noticed most critically.

People judge you by its appearance. It tells the world what you are.

If you wear your hair becomingly and always have it beautifully clean and well-kept, it adds more than anything else to your attractiveness and charm.

Beautiful hair is not a matter of luck, it is simply a matter of care.

Study your hair, take a hand mirror and look at the front, the sides and the back. Try doing it up in various ways. See just how it looks best.

A slight change in the way you dress your hair, or in the way you care for it, makes all the difference in the world in its appearance.

In caring for the hair, shampooing is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

When your hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh-looking, soft and silky.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why discriminating women, everywhere, now use Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your hair look, just follow this simple method:

A Simple, Easy Method

FIRST, put two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water. Then wet the hair and scalp with clear warm water. Pour the Mulsified evenly over the hair and rub it thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length, down to the ends of the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp. After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly—always using clear, fresh, warm water.

Then use another application of Mulsified, again working up a lather and

Dress Your Hair To Emphasize Your Best Lines Only

Begin by studying your profile. If you have a short nose, do not put your hair on the top of your head; if you have a round, full face, do not fluff your hair out too much at the sides; if your face is very thin and long, then you should fluff your hair out at the sides. The woman with the full face and double chin should wear her hair high. All these and other individual features must be taken into consideration in selecting the proper hairdress. Above all, simplicity should prevail. You are always most attractive when your hair looks most natural—when it looks most like you.

rubbing it in briskly as before.

You can easily tell when the hair is perfectly clean, for it will be soft and silky in the water.

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage—and it will be noticed and admired by everyone. You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

Beware of imitations. Be sure you get Mulsified.

Look for the name Watkins on the package.

THERE is general interest in the new "Clay treatment" for the complexion, to which we referred in our August article. Most women realize that keeping the skin fresh and fair is the first step towards setting Old Time at defiance, in the kind of dodging

Let no one think that we are advocating the lavish use of powder and rouge or that we are not advocates of soap and water. On the other hand, we are quite enthusiastic on the subject of soap and believe that it keeps pace with civilization, the cakes forming milestones as it dance which we play, in order to look as young and bright as we can.

There are women who, proudly, and with an air of conscious virtue, make the declaration: "I don't use anything but soap and water on my face—and never shall." These women would look much better and feel more comfortable for an application of powder during the hot weather; and, as they grow older, will discover that a little face cream has both a cleansing and beautifying effect. were. That sentiment may be a little "mixed" in its form of expression, but we mean to say that Bolshevism and soap could not go together, and we firmly believe that Socialism and soap are strangers. We do not know when the first bath was taken, but we are quite certain that it meant the plunge into civilization. Wherefore, we are ready to sing a song of soap on any occasion and believe that the way of lather leads to loveliness.

There are conditions of the skin which call for more than soap and water, a (Continued on page 24)

At Seven O'Clock

"Yes, Mrs. Beauchamp. She wanted to know about the Christmas concert at the infirmary and if we were singing. I didn't trouble to call you."

What a mockery it all seemed. When Christmas came she would be miles away. An ocean might divide her from the infirmary concert—from that room itself. Love demanded many sacrifices, and Mrs. Grange felt she would be thankful when she had paid the last and was away.

She saw her husband off next morning, packed the clothes she intended taking, and then set herself to wait.

It was six o'clock and she was seated in the drawing-room. Everything was ready. She had even written the letter to her husband, and it lay on the table only a few feet from her. She glanced at the clock. Only another hour.

The sound of a motor stopping outside the house did not rouse her. It was only when the door opened and a white-faced servant stood on the threshold that she awoke from her reverie.

The girl was trembling. "The master, ma'am," she gasped. "There's been an accident and they're bringing him in."

Mrs. Grange rose. In the hall stood a tall policeman, and resting limply in his arms her husband. His face was white, his eyes closed. "What is the matter?" she said.

"There has been an accident, ma'am. The gentleman's car was run into by another one. Shall I carry him in there?" He nodded towards the open door of the dining-room.

"No; take him up to the bedroom." She saw him placed on the bed and fell on her knees by his side. Forgotten was all thought of Dr. Musgrave and the journey she was so soon to take. Her husband was injured, dying perhaps.

"Have you called a doctor?" she asked the servant.

"No, ma'am." Mrs. Grange rushed downstairs and took the receiver off the hook.

She waited in a fever for the number. "Is that Dr. Musgrave speaking? I'm Mrs. Grange—Muriel. I want you to come round at once. My husband has had a bad accident and I want you to see him."

Within ten minutes Dr. Musgrave was at the house. "What is the matter?" he asked.

"Charles has been smashed up in his car—and I am afraid."

"Let me see him," said Dr. Musgrave. For ten minutes he examined Mr. Grange in silence.

"He won't die?" said Mrs. Grange. There was a tremor in her voice as she spoke.

For a second Dr. Musgrave looked at her, wondering if she remembered. Then the doctor vanquished the man.

"I hope not, but I must perform an operation at once. It is a good thing I brought everything with me. I cannot wait for another doctor. Have you someone you can let me have to help me—someone with strong nerves."

"I will stay."

"You?"

"Yes, it is my place—I am his wife."

"I see." Dr. Musgrave gave her one quick look, then he was the professional man again. "Have some water made hot at once—boiling, please—and I shall want some basins." He was attending to his instruments even while he spoke.

"What are you going to do?" asked Mrs. Grange.

"A portion of bone is pressing on his brain and I must remove that bone at once. It is his only chance."

A sudden fear seized Mrs. Grange, and with it came understanding. "You'll save his life," she implored. "I—I couldn't—"

"If it is humanly possible."

For half-an-hour Dr. Musgrave fought his fight against death, while Mrs. Grange watched him fascinated. She admired him more during that half-hour than she had ever done previously.

At last she saw her husband lying back in bed, his head bandaged. Dr. Musgrave turned to her. "You can leave now—I will join you in the drawing-room in a few minutes."

Mechanically Mrs. Grange obeyed. Downstairs she paced the room in an agony of apprehension until the door opened.

"How is he?" she asked eagerly.

"The operation has been quite successful, and he will recover from the effects of the chloroform in a few minutes now."

"You think he will live?" "With careful nursing. The immediate danger is over."

Mrs. Grange took a step forward and held out her hand impulsively. "I do not know how to thank you," she said. Her hand fell suddenly to her side.

Dr. Musgrave drew out his watch. "Do you know it is exactly seven o'clock?" he said.

Mrs. Grange shuddered. "Don't—please don't," she pleaded. "I must have been mad. But I didn't realize what he meant to me until I saw him brought home."

Dr. Musgrave made no reply for a moment. He was a man again, and before him stood the woman he loved. He was standing by the table and his eyes were fastened upon a letter which lay on it.

"Was this the letter you wrote to him?"

Mrs. Grange took a couple of steps forward. She picked up the letter, tore it into four, and flung the pieces into the fire.

"Yes," she replied.

"I understand." Dr. Musgrave turned towards the door. His voice was lifeless. On the threshold he paused. "I will call to-morrow and see how he is. After that I shall have to leave him to my locum tenens."

"You will be leaving? I am so sorry." Mrs. Grange felt the words were pitifully inadequate.

"For a little while at least, I feel I want a change—a rest."

Mrs. Grange averted her face. She realised in that second that it is not always the woman who pays. When she looked up the room was empty.

resort to a very thorough cleansing of the skin. There are so many pores that it is almost impossible to keep them as open and healthy as self-respecting pores ought to be, unless we resort occasionally to a systematic renovation of the face—a kind of garret-to-cellar affair—which will remove impurities and leave us feeling all cleaned and brightened, like the brilliant and attractive saucepans in the artistic advertisements for some kind of cleansing powder. Here comes in the virtue of the clay preparation, which goes farther and does more in less time than the ordinary lotion. You must pay close attention to directions, however—as we may have said before. Do not rub the preparation on, as if it were a cream and be sure to allow it to remain on the face for twenty minutes.

ARE the feet giving you trouble, this summer? If they are, please attend to that callous or that corn without delay, for the feet must be comfortable, if you are to be at ease. A callous spot must be overcome by persistent treatment, and, if the "arch" is threatening to fall, wear a proper support for the foot. That famous United States humorist, Josh Billings, said on one occasion that he liked to wear tight shoes because they made him forget all his other troubles. A tight shoe causes about as much discomfort as an aching tooth—and oh, what a difference when the offending shoe is removed and the poor, cramped foot has an opportunity to expand! Really it must be dreadful to be a Chinese lady which studies the individual figure and provides a corset just suited to your weight and style. The trend of modern shoe fashions is also all in the direction of studying various types, rather than supplying wares which are suited to only one order of foot. Find out the shoe which suits you best and you will know what true comfort means. It is quite possible, in these enlightened days to secure shoes which are both smart and sensible but as you value your present comfort and the future shapeliness of the foot, do not wear a shoe which is too narrow or too short.

THE LETTER BOX

MABEL:—If electrolysis has failed to remove the superfluous hair, I am afraid that depilatories will not be of much use. The electric needle is usually regarded as the most thorough agency in the removal of those intruding hairs which come so often where they are least wanted. Our hair may fall out, our eye-brows become scanty, but, just as we are bewailing this wilful decrease of the hair, we discover that an entirely unwished for moustache is forming on the upper lip or an unbecoming downiness is spreading on the cheeks. I have sent you the names of several depilatories. However, I feel that if electrolysis has failed, your best course would be to let a specialist examine the growth.

FANNY:—What a delightful name—old-fashioned and a bit coquettish, reminding us of the times of crinoline and furbelows! If you have acquired a coat of tan, you will not be able to cast it off at once, as if it were, indeed, a garment. There is nothing more easy than to accumulate a goodly supply of freckles or a "spreading" of tan over face, neck and arms; but it is entirely another matter to get rid of the brown spots or the clinging covering of tan. The clay treatment of which I have written will help in this process of driving away the tan. I have sent you the name of a good cream.

GOLDENROD:—That is a bright, seasonable name. I hope you are not one of those unfortunates for whom goldenrod spells hay fever. It is such a beautiful bloom, in its soft richness, that I am always sorry for the sensitive citizens who sneeze at the sight of it. So you wonder how you may get rid of those unsightly little spots. Well, bathing the face in warm water with plentiful use of a good soap and face brush will help—and there are lotions which will complete the good work. The city, remember, is very hard on the feminine complexion and the brush is a necessity.

MARTHA:—Of course, if you are a really busy Martha, your hands will become red and hard if you are not careful. I cheerfully admit that it is better to be a red-handed Martha than to be a lily-handed idler—but it is not necessary to possess a hard and beet-like hand, even if you are working like the busiest bee in the hive. Wear gloves when you do heavy tasks—and don't let any one laugh you out of doing this, have lemon or vinegar on the sink and wear becreamed gloves at night. Now, don't be a foolish Martha and say that you do not care of certain rank and have the feet crushed into an unnatural smallness.

However, it is no longer becoming to wear shoes too small for the wearer. The tight corset has gone and has given place to the modern artistic corsetry

Odds and Ends

White-haired, one-legged, seventy-seven years of age, the indomitable Bernhardt is considering an American tour. "Good heavens!" says some one, "why doesn't the poor old girl give up, and retire in peace?" Principally, I suppose, because she wants the money. But it is not difficult to realize that a person who has always been such a driving worker as Mme. Bernhardt is not willing to give up as long as there is still a public that wants her. It is, of course, her name and past fame that she can still conjure with. And there is always a young public that will run to see a famous name that has ceased to be merely a name and become an entity.

But also there is the eternal urge to work in the energetic temperament. We saw it instanced during the war, when many old men were thrilled to the heart—some of them retired army and navy men—to have the opportunity of proving their usefulness once more.

Bernhardt, no doubt, believes that she will be proving her artistic value to the public if she comes and has a successful tour (a tour, by the way, that would not extend beyond the East.)

But I question very much if the flame in the artist-soul survives to the age of seventy-seven, says a California critic.

Mrs. Stevenson's body has lain in the local cemetery awaiting a chance to convey it across the treacherous waters and to make the ascent of Mount Veia in safety. A grand tomb is pointed out to the strangers off Saint Malo on the Breton coast, where the eminent French author, Chateaubriand, had a rock jutting into the sea hollowed for his coffin. On the anniversary of his death, July 4th, each year a cure from the village says mass on the shore directly opposite and recites the office of the dead, a ceremony which attracts the tourists all over the north of France. Sarah Bernhardt has recently purchased a spot similar to Chateaubriand's and adjacent to it and will be interred where the Breton waves will dash over her tomb ceaselessly and recite her requiem.

* * *

Miss Eleanor M. Roach, Superintendent of Quebec Women's Institutes, has been interesting the women and girls in rural communities in striving for a better domestic education. Many mothers have not time to teach their daughters to become home-makers, but they are very anxious that their girls take advantage of any opportunities which arise.

Waiting for a meal.

The technique is there, the trained voice of an artist of the stage has wonderful longevity, but the imagination, the magnetism of youth that reaches well into maturity, probably will have passed away. Bernhardt is still a personality, but on the stage it will be hard to imagine her as much more than a shell of the vital, compelling, magnetic actress whom we saw in her prime.

* * *

A unique and touching ceremony occurred a few weeks ago in Samoa when the body of Fanny Osborne Stevenson was buried beside her distinguished husband on the great rock of Mount Veia, which towers almost a thousand feet above the Pacific, says the Washington "Star." In the few days of his Samoan life, when the beloved novelist was strong enough to tramp and climb, he made the ascent of this isolated peak, which rises from the ocean about 500 feet off the mainland, and, struck with its solemn grandeur, its remoteness from human contact, he asked that the rock might be his tomb. Mrs. Stevenson in her last testament provided for the conveyance of her remains to be placed beside her husband's, and this has recently been fulfilled.

Of the many illustrious men who have selected rock tombs in isolated spots, Stevenson's and his wife's are by far the noblest and most remote. So stormy has been the season about the Samoan Islands that for nearly eight months

Requests have come to Miss Roach this year for eight courses of one week each, but because of the small staff, only the first four making application have been accepted.

In Shawville, Pontiac County, the course was given to the Junior Women's Institute. There was an average attendance of eighteen girls from the ages of twelve to eighteen years.

In Shawville there was a very good household science equipment purchased by the Shawville Women's Institute. The first lesson was on canning fruit, each girl bringing her own fruit, sugar, jar, etc., and taking home with her, her own finished product after the public display the last day.

In the afternoon of the first day the girls came with their gingham chambray, needles, thread and thimbles, for their first lesson in sewing, and that afternoon eight kimono sleeve dresses were cut out. Each afternoon the girls met and worked. In the end there were sixteen out of eighteen dresses finished.

Each morning a cooking lesson was held. A second lesson was in canning vegetables by the cold pack, or one day method, and such vegetables as peas beans, carrots and onions were put away for winter use, and proud were the girls of the results. On the third day the girls made supper dishes. The fourth lesson was simple desserts, and for these a plain custard was made and varied with fruits, nuts, cake, etc.

"I saved $16 on this one dress!"

AND just think—it's only one of seven I've made this season. They're the prettiest dresses I've ever had and it's surprising how much I've saved by making them myself.

Take this one dress as an example. It would have cost at least $40 in the shops—perhaps $45. And I never could have afforded to buy it at that price.

"Yet by making it myself I had to pay only for the materials. I saved $16 on this one dress alone, and I have saved as much or more on the other six. Altogether I have saved more than $100 on my clothes this season.

"Do you wonder that I am glad I took up dressmaking with the Woman's Institute? It isn't only that I have more and prettier dresses than I could ever have afforded to buy, but it has been such good fun making them. And to think that only a few months ago I could hardly sew a straight seam!"

THIS is the story of what just one woman saved by learning to make her own clothes. And she is only one of thousands who have solved their clothes problems with the help of the Woman's Institute.

"I am having wonderful success," writes Mrs. Herbert Seavy. "I have just finished a pongee blouse, which I designed myself, and if I do say so, it is the prettiest blouse I have seen this year.

"My husband says I have more than paid for my course now, for I have made countless things for the kiddies besides my own clothes."

Here's a fine letter from Mrs. William Carlson, who writes: "I must tell you that I entered a little dress at the Minnesota State Fair and it took the first prize in its class, as well as the sweepstake of all the children's dresses entered. I feel quite proud of my work."

Mrs. Kathleen Bird writes: "My little layette is progressing very nicely, and I find the greatest enjoyment in working with those tiny garments."

"I have visited the most exclusive shops and copied their most expensive things for a wee per cent of their cost in the shop. For instance, one little dress with hand-run tucks, a tiny spray of embroidery, and scalloped lower edge finished with lace was marked $15. I copied it in even nicer material for about $3. I know, too, that my little one will have as fine and dainty garments as the wealthiest child, and besides the great difference in cost, I have had the joy of making them myself."

"WHEN I began your course," writes Mrs. J. C. Miller, "I intended completing it before starting in business, but when about half way through a friend asked me to make her two dresses as a favor, and since then the work has come in faster than I can do it, and competent help is so hard to obtain. Last month I earned $68, so you see I have my hands full. I am desirous of giving my girls a good education. That is what I am working for, and, thanks to the Woman's Institute, I have made a good start toward realizing my dream."

And note the splendid success of Mrs. Dora E. Gray. "Since I began to sew for others," she writes, "my work has brought me $465, or an average of a little better than $50 a month. And I have done all the sewing for myself and my boy and girl. Before taking the course I wouldn't think of making anything but house dresses; now I am not afraid to attempt anything."

Miss Clorinda B. Ramsey writes: "I have now made five pretty dresses, and one that I made about a month ago was mistaken for an imported gown. Just think of having a wardrobe of lovely dresses after having spent barely fifty dollars! Counting in the cost of the lessons, my clothes have cost less this year than ever before."

AREN'T you glad to know that there is an easy way by which you, too, can learn right at home to make the pretty, distinctive, becoming dresses you have always wanted, and have them for a half or a third of what the shops are asking?

And aren't you glad to know that you can so easily prepare yourself to make money right at home sewing for others?

The letters printed above are actual letters from students of the Woman's Institute. There are hundreds of others on file at the Institute—many of them from girls and women who "could hardly sew a straight seam" when they enrolled.

When everything has been made so easy for you—when by just a little pleasant work in the comfort of your own home you can have the kind of pretty, becoming clothes that every one will admire—can you afford to let another day go by without at least finding out what the Woman's Institute can do for you?

Just send a letter, post card, or the convenient coupon below to the Woman's Institute, Dept. 31-J, Scranton, Penna., and you will receive, without a penny of cost or the slightest obligation, the full story of this great school that is bringing to women and girls all over the world the happiness of having dainty, becoming clothes and hats, savings almost too good to be true, and the joy of being independent in a successful business.

Lighting Fixtures and Lighting Effects

BY ALICE CARROLL

MUCH of the beauty and charm of the home is contingent upon its lighting effects, and more and more thought is given each year to the factors which promise not only this beauty and charm but comfort and convenience as well.

In years past we resigned ourselves to gaudy domes and chandeliers just because they happened to be installed in the house we leased or purchased, and viewed as hopeless any attempt to harmonize them with furnishings and hangings. When summer came and the house took on the spring freshness of cretonne and wicker we endured the glare of unshaded lamps and garish fixtures nor hoped for respite when chill winds heralded the season of log fires and velour hangings.

Acceptance did not mean submission, however, and eventually the manufacturers of lighting fixtures and lighting effects responded to the appeal for more beauty and charm in quality and design. The size and shape of the room; the color and texture of hangings; the architectural grandeur or simplicity of the home—all these were taken into consideration, and little by little the restful and lovely in lighting effects supplanted the garish and gaudy.

The modern house is accordingly wired with a view to beauty as well as comfort and convenience; and instead of two per cent of the building cost appropriated for lighting and fixtures at least five per cent. is allotted by the up-to-date builder.

Correct lighting vivifies the art of the decorator and lighting fixtures are the media through which this art approaches its zenith. Fixtures cannot be concealed, so they must be made beautiful. Their color, contour and character must harmonize and enhance the general decorative scheme, not only when softened by artificial light, but when exposed to the steady glare of daylight and sunlight.

Too many people forget, when selecting lighting fixtures, that they must harmonize by daylight as well as lamplight, and though artificial illumination may enrich the tone and texture of a cheap fixture, daylight is almost sure to accentuate its garishness. This is the reason why so many rooms that soothe and charm by night are harsh and unfriendly by day and vice versa. This is the reason why there should be no compromise on the quality of lighting fixtures, because they determine, perhaps more than any other factor, the aesthetic possibilities of a room.

Bright spots of light and color may be introduced by means of fixtures. Some may even produce light from a purely decorative standpoint, providing a radiance or atmospheric color more keenly sensed than seen.

The fixture determines the light value almost as readily as the lamp itself because the fixture is the channel of distribution, and its texture and design may make or mar the quality of the light diffused.

There is a growing preference nowadays for side wall illumination, especially in the living room, and this has revived the use of the old-fashioned sconce, usually fashioned of metal and shaded with decorative screens of glass, silk or parchment.

Many authorities on illumination claim that translucent glass is the correct medium for light diffusion and it has always been preferred to parchment or silken shades for purely utility lighting. It is a fact that the light spot or source may be almost entirely eliminated by diffusion through proper glass and that a restful as well as a clear, steady light results.

Correct lighting involves the useful as well as the beautiful; the practical as well as the decorative, and these apparently opposing forces must merge if health and comfort as well as beauty and harmony are to pervade the home.

A house may have adequate wiring and include the desired number of outlets and still be a failure from the standpoint of illumination if lighting fixtures are selected without care.

A Secret Marriage

BY KATHERINE TYNAN

VASHTI SIMON had had a somewhat remarkable upbringing. At an early age she had left her father's house in Montagu-square for a cottage in the country, where in great seclusion she had been brought up by a governess who had taught her all things that a young lady ought to know.

Vashti was very fond of her governess. The very sweet and very sad-looking lady, Mrs. Seymour, was one of Reuben Simon's strange finds—the last person you would expect in the service of a money-lender looking after the education of his daughter. She was obviously an aristocrat, and was, indeed, the widow of a younger son of a younger son, who, having run through his slender patrimony, blew out his foolish brains, leaving his young widow to settle up with his creditors.

Reuben Simon had been good to her, as he had been to many people, and her gratitude to him was a very real thing. It made her devote herself, in the first instance, to bringing up his daughter with all the circumstances of refinement. Mrs. Seymour was nominally governess; but Vashti had visiting tutors and governesses for all manner of things. Mrs. Seymour often wondered over Reuben Simon's passion for educating his one girl. Of course, she would probably be very rich one day; but still, there were times when the lady who had become very fond of her charge as the years passed by, was assailed by doubts of what would happen when Vashti would awaken one day to the knowledge that she was the daughter of a money-lender.

The secret had been carefully kept from her. No one about her knew it except Mrs. Seymour. Mr. Simon never visited the cottage, but now and again Vashti and Mrs. Seymour went up and stayed at a London hotel for a week or so; and Vashti was taken out by her father, and had her wardrobe renewed, and was loaded with all manner of things which Mrs. Seymour thought much too fine for a young girl, and Vashti was quite prepared to relinquish if only she might have had a little more of her father's company. She had been brought up a Christian, too—a strange thing for Reuben Simon's daughter, for if he was not orthodox in his secret soul he was certainly so in his outward observances.

A strange man, Mrs. Seymour thought, seeing how devoted he was to his little daughter, to deprive himself of her companionship as she grew up. However, Reuben Simon had been so generous to her that he had made her his unquestioning servant. She was only sorry for the child, who adored her father and fretted at the long separations from him.

She began to understand when, about the time of Vashti's seventeenth birthday, she was startled by a curt note from Mr. Simon informing her that he intended coming to the cottage on such and such a day, bringing a visitor with him, a gentleman. He wanted everything to be at its best, so he was sending down a French cook for a week. Mrs. Seymour must arrange matters with old Elspeth, who had done very well for the cottage during the years of undisturbed quiet.

The Palace of the Sleeping Beauty was suddenly awake. With the French cook there came a supply of delicate foods, wines, and a whole little outfit of cooking utensils very pretty to look at, at which Elspeth sniffed. Copper and iron had been good enough for her, and she had no faith in the brown and green-coloured earthenware which was the French cook's magasin de cuisine.

M. Lebout, too, was of Reuben Simon's faithful servants. The money-lender seemed to have pulled an uncommon number of people out of holes in the course of his career. The man put a joyous energy into his cooking which money would not have bought.

The cottage was turned upside down. It had always looked neatness and purity itself; but now carpets were taken up, curtains taken down, walls swept—a general turning out and furbishing. Reuben Simon's servants did not serve him with half a heart.

The cottage was delightful the evening Reuben and his guest arrived. It was a wet winter night outside, but within all was warm and glowing. The daintiest of tables awaited the travellers; M. Lebout had excelled himself in the meal he had prepared; Mrs. Seymour, waiting expectantly in the drawing-room, wearing a gown of soft grey with a fichu of old lace, was a charming hostess. Vashti, seeming to creep behind her, was at least striking-looking in her white frock with the bunch of holly-berries in the bosom of it, for the season was near Christmas.

The Eastern blood showed in the girl's dark colour, heavy hair, and passionate eyes. She was not of the overblown type. On the contrary, she was very thin, though even now there was a strange grace in her leanness and length. In her immaturity some people might have thought her ugly. The hair was too heavy, the features somewhat solidly moulded for her youth; if she was shy she kept the large lids persistently down over the beautiful eyes. She did not look at her best this evening. She was feeling that the stranger Papa was bringing was going to destroy the happiness of his visit. How happy they could have been with the beloved Papa at the Cottage, sleeping under its roof for positively the first time, if it were not for the stranger, the very thought of whom terrified her timid soul!

Mrs. Seymour understood, divined that the girl was so alarmed that she could have run away anywhere to avoid the mysterious visitor, the thought of whom was a certain trouble and problem to herself. She drew the girl's hand through her arm as they stood by the fire awaiting the sound of the carriage bringing the visitors. Absurd that she should be so troubled. It was a result, no doubt, of her life of seclusion. Why should not Mr. Simon bring a visitor? It might be a grave and reverend seignior for all she knew. She had no reason for her vain imaginings that this visit was the event towards which all the quiet years at the Cottage, with the unconscionably fine training for the money-lender's daughter had been leading up.

* * *

HER thoughts were scattered by the sound of the wheels for which they had been listening. She drew the girl to her and felt the heart in Vashti's breast flutter like a wild thing. There was a commotion of arrival. Reuben Simon came into the room. For the first time Vashti did not spring into his arms. A fair young man followed him—quite young, little more than twenty, Mrs. Seymour judged. He was handsome but for the gloom of his face. His eyes were sullen. He looked as though he had been tasting bitter waters.

"Lord Askdale."

The introductions were made. The young man bowed with a mechanical good manner. He had fair, silky hair, and apart from his brooding look he would have worn an open, honest expression. Despite her uneasiness, a vague pity stirred in Mrs. Seymour's heart for the boy. What had been happening to him? A Prodigal Son who had no forgiveness for himself: that was the image which occurred to her. He glanced furtively and with distaste at Vashti. Mrs. Seymour noted the look with a certain indignation for her girl, then looked at Vashti herself. Why, the child was positively ugly with that lowering look. She might well be taken for heavy and dull.

Mr. Simon and Mrs. Seymour had to talk for four at the dinner-table. The other two never spoke at all, but looked down at their plates. There was something about the young man's look which was tragical and stirred an aching pity

The Mother's Help

Vision

Nellie had never considered insurance until Ned explained his policy to her. Then she began to think it out for herself.

No money could cover Ned's value to her and the children. Still it was true that it was his duty to value and protect his earning power, so that if he died they should not suffer a double loss—home as well as husband and father. For the sake of the children it was necessary to consider such possibilities and guard against them.

But children are a joint responsibility.

"If I were to die," thought Nellie, "nobody could really take my place to my blessed babies. But I would like to know that they would have as good a substitute as money could buy."

"The housekeeping would cost the same even if I were not here, perhaps more—because no outsider would plan and work as I am happy to do for them. The kind of a woman I would like to have in my place—educated—efficient—trained—would cost money. Could that money be provided at a moment's notice?"

Value

Nellie told Ned she wanted to be insured too. He was opposed to the idea, feeling that he should carry the financial responsibility. But she asked him—Was she of real value to the children? Had she not a right to direct their education? Did he not think that every mother had a lasting responsibility toward her children? Ned was honest. He had to agree.

Variation

Ned got his friend—the London Life agent—to talk it over with them both.

He advised a 20-year endowment policy of $1,000 for Nellie.

It was really a glorified savings account.

Nellie was 26. The yearly premium was $48.65. If she paid that sum twenty times she would have saved $973. Should she die while the children were small they would receive $1,000—a much larger sum than she could save in the same time.

If she lived for 20 years—and the children were grown up and settled—she would have $1,000 with interest and profits.

Vindication

"That will be 95 cents a week. I can easily pay that out of the housekeeping money," said Nellie.

Ned paid the first premium for her and Nellie began to save the second, week by week. Ned adds an extra 95 cents weekly to this amount so that she can carry a $2,000 policy.

It is wonderful how easy it is to save that little amount.

And Nellie does not mean to die.

She means to cash that check when she is 46 and spend it on a silver honeymoon with Ned.

Nellie's policy was based on one that had already matured with the London Life.

Policy, 6598. Issued, 1902. Amount, $1,000. Age at Issue, 26. Premium, $48.65.

Year	Profits Paid	Premium Paid
1902-06	$19.35	$243.25
1907-11	38.11	223.90
1912-16	87.44	205.14
1917-21	125.73	155.81

Settlement at maturity. Face value of policy, $1,000. Last distribution of policy, $125.73, $1,125.73.

Return for each $100.00 paid, $135.94.

Judging from past results, she would have a good return for her money, as well as sure protection for the children meantime.

Women's Musical Clubs

The part they have played in recent musical development and their possibilities for the future

BY HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

IN Canadian towns and cities, in common with those of many sections of the United States, the extension of interest in music as an art, has owed a great deal to women's musical clubs. Their gradual increase is one of the most hopeful signs for music in this country. One reason very frequently advanced, in proof of their excellence as an influence, is that they secure results of a definite character within a comparatively short space of time.

It matters not whether a town be large or small, the formation of a musical club to promote really artistic concerts is a healthy sign, and already the growth of such institutions has led to broadening of taste which has greatly extended the field for concert singers and instrumentalists of the better order. It must be admitted that in this form of social activity women take the lead of the men; and that music as an art could hardly survive without their zealous support.

The musical club gives scope to the woman of real civic enthusiasm who feels that she would like to do something for the betterment of the community in which she lives; and it enables individuals of like aim to get together and plan artistic delights for their neighbors. Every year new places are being added to the musical map by just that spirit. One factor I have noted about the movement is the singular vitality of such clubs. Associations of other kinds are formed but frequently die after a year or two, but the women's musical club seems to get a real hold on public sentiment and to grow, to use an old simile, like a snowball going down hill.

It is hardly necessary to expatiate at length on how such organizations may be brought into being. Of course the first step is for a number of leading spirits to get together and unite for the express purpose of spreading the gospel of good music. In almost every town there are a few women of musical education who may form a nucleus to bring others in. It is not difficult for such a group to arrange programmes among themselves without at the outset calling in professional concert artists. Let us suppose that they decide to start with a Grieg programme. One perhaps can give a group of short numbers for the pianoforte, with such the works of the Norwegian abound. One or two more can get up some of the songs of Grieg. And perhaps there is a violinist in the town who can play one of his works for that instrument. The beginnings may be made by holding musicales in the homes of various members just like clubs formed for other purposes. The various hostesses can each perhaps take charge of the arrangement of the programme for her particular day. In this way five or six afternoons can be spread out over the winter season.

Thus you get a nucleus of interested people together who may presently embark on a somewhat more ambitious scale and arrange for a visit from some artist of distinction to give a recital in some local auditorium, a church or a school, if no other place is available. It is easier to keep a women's musical club alive than to give vitality to a Women's Canadian Club, for instance, because the material to arouse continuous interest is so much richer. In many towns there is no local concert agent who brings singers or other types of performers within reach of the community and thus the Club fills a real want by assuming such functions.

With the development of such a club it may be found feasible to promote the formation of a choral society or amateur orchestra and to sufficiently arouse local enthusiasm to induce some ambitious and talented professional musician to settle in the town and "do things." The leading Conservatories are constantly turning out energetic and gifted graduates who are looking for prospects and opportunities to build up a clientele just as are newly fledged doctors and lawyers. In some instances a single church choir, or (better still) the choirs of two or three churches have effectively united and formed an organization that in a comparatively brief period has been able to promote and participate in concerts of real communal interest. One very beneficial effect of musical clubs is that they help to break up cliques and reconcile differences which tend to narrow small town life. The singing organization may be a growth of the club itself; or better still I think, a by-product stimulated and encouraged by the club. It is important to bring in as large a membership as possible whether able to contribute in a musical sense or not. The real object of such organizations is to bring music into the lives of those unacquainted with its finer developments. It is quite certain that the town which once gets a musical club functioning finds itself a happier town.

* * *

I HAVE spoken of the initial steps to be taken in centres where women's musical clubs do not exist. The many organizations of the kind which have already come into being and which have long and honorable records of achievement would furnish a fruitful field for comment. At present I am informed there is a movement under way to bring into being a system of co-ordinated effort among the existing women's musical clubs of Canada, particularly those of Ontario and the West. Such a system would undoubtedly be very beneficial in an economic way. Under the present highly organized state of the concert business on this continent it is much more expensive to bring an artist for an individual concert say at London, Ontario, or Regina, than if the same artist were booked for a series of concerts with musical clubs covering thirty towns and cities along something like a continuous route. The saving in the matter of travelling expenses alone constitutes a very important item; but the system if it can be brought into working order would effect savings in other respects as well. It is quite obvious that the average artist who is assured of a long continuous engagement covering conveniently distributed points, will be willing to sing for a smaller fee than if he is booked in the sporadic way which means a concert at Winnipeg one week and possibly one at Richmond, Virginia, the next. The memoirs of the late David Bispham, one of the most popular of concert singers, the author has told of the terrible strain that the erratic system of touring which prevailed in the hey-day of his powers, involved for the artist. Exhausting journeys by rail, changes of climate, anxieties as to railroad connections, all tend to fatigue and loss of voice; whereas these difficulties can be overcome if clubs get together and book the artist as a group rather than under the individual system. I understand that the Women's Musical Club of Toronto has already taken the initiative in this matter; and if the plan can be worked out, it should have a very important influence on the prosperity of such organizations everywhere.

The growth of such clubs within the present century has had a very important influence on musical art generally, owing to the form which club enterprise usually takes. It has tended to encourage the growth of the "recital" of distinct artistic purpose as distinguished from the old-fashioned mixed concert. The "recital" is a comparatively modern development. It is said to have been invented by the great pianist Franz Liszt as early as 1840. Prior to Liszt's time, pianists were usually heard in combination with performers of other types. A tenor, a soprano, a pianist, a violinist and a harpist would perhaps be heard together in a programme that represented a hodge podge of all schools. Not until Liszt initiated the practice, was the recital by a single individual thought of as possible, and

THE news of the death of Mrs. Everard Cotes (Sara Jeannette Duncan) came to the Canadians who know her work, with a sense of literary loss, and to all who had the privilege of knowing her personally it brought regret for the passing of a bright and gallant spirit. Sara Jeannette Duncan was born in Brantford, the city which was the early home of several citizens whose fame has gone beyond the bounds of the Dominion. Norman Duncan (who was not a relative) came from the same town;—and Pauline Johnson, whose body rests in the shelter of Stanley Park, Vancouver, was also of the town of Brant, while the great Scottish inventor, Alexander Graham Bell, who was buried last month on the summit of the Beinn Bhreagh Mountain, Cape Breton Island, spent his early days near the same picturesque spot. Many tales are told of the wit and sprightliness of the girl, who, at an early age, showed a gift for writing. Miss Duncan found a journalistic position on "The Globe," contributing special articles over the signature, "Garth Grafton." The Washington "Post" also contained her contributions, but it was soon evident that her gift was for work more enduring than the feature article.

When the C. P. R. was young, Miss Duncan, with a friend whom she called "Orthodocia," crossed the Dominion and visited Japan and India, returning to Canada by way of Europe. This daring feat for the eighties found a chronicle in the book, "A Social Departure," which won immediate popularity. Since then the work of this writer has been looked upon as literary craftsmanship of fine order. There is a long list of books to the credit of this writer, the most interesting to Canadian readers being "The Imperialist."

After her world-tour, Miss Duncan was married to Mr. Everard Cotes, a correspondent for the London "Times," in India, and her removal to that country meant, of course, a complete change of scene and subject. Several of her novels are of Anglo-Indian life, "His Honor and a Lady" and "The Burnt Offering" being the best known of these productions. Mrs. Cotes was unquestionably the finest of Canadian women novelists. Her work had a finish, a sense of literary restraint and discrimination in an age which is all too fond of the crude and the obvious. Her humor and wit are delightful in sparkle and spontaneity, and her sense of tragedy is such as a nature sensitive to mirth usually knows. Her work remains, an inheritance for East and West, well worth a place in any library.

The Best Fruit of a Garden

BY ALICE M. RATHBONE

LONG and serious discourses upon happiness have ended without a word for the value of gardening as one of the very simplest means to that end. The truly wise, however, know full well this happy secret, and rejoice according in the best of all fruits of garden labor.

To Emerson's "Give me health and a day," let us add a little garden. "The pomp of emperors" is indeed "ridiculous" compared with the bliss that comes from "a few and cheap elements" within reach of almost all of us. One condition only is to be met, if we would grow this fruit called happiness to perfection, and pluck it with unmingled joy. It must flourish in a garden not too large to be under its fortunate owner's personal care. No factotum, be he never so well disposed really to help, should be allowed to invade the little garden after the turning of the earth is accomplished in the spring, lest opportunities for happiness escape us. The sowing of the seed, the tucking comfortably away of the wonderful bulbs in the fresh earth, the staking and training of plants, even the weeding of borders and the sweeping of walks, are all so many means of grace to the garden-lover.

Is a fit of the blues impending? Then sally forth well armed with a trowel, rake, hoe—all the needful weapons—and the demons will fly before you, perchance, in some neglected corner of the back yard, and as the little folk cultivate, at the same time, their gardens and their tastes, they are providing themselves with a pleasant resource for their declining years. Lady Mary Montague tells us "Gardening is certainly the next amusement to reading, and as my sight will now permit me little Flower of Velvet Richness—Salpiglossis, or velvet flower, comes in practically all colors and grows from 1 ft. to 2 ft. high. It is admirable for both garden effects and cutting.

of that, I am glad to form a taste that can give me so much employment, and be the plaything of my age, now that my pen and needle are almost useless to me."

In a garden, if anywhere, "the little arts of happiness" do certainly abound. As one goes out of a morning, the opening of a long-watched-for blossom may change the aspect of a whole day, and it is precisely this simple, natural coming of the garden pleasures that makes them never-ending, while the happy garden hours last. Nowhere, however, does staid old Father Time allow himself to take on such flighty ways as in a garden—the pleasant hours are gone before one knows—and this trick of his is the nearest approach to a flaw in the joy of the summer-time.

Our good old Henry—factotum, philosopher and friend in one—summed up this question of the best fruit of a garden in his own wise way: "You don't want a garden too large," said he, "just large enough to make you happy. It'll do that. I've tried it many a time. It makes you feel good when you feel bad."

"Who loves his garden, still keeps his Eden."

Flower of Forgetfulness—The annual poppies are splendid flowers where vividness and profusion of colour are desired.

quite dismayed by the variety of fresh interests to be found even in a garden reduced to its simplest terms.

A neighbor, transplanted from her maiden home into new and somewhat uncongenial surroundings, found unfailing relief from homesickness, in her garden, through the summer, among her window-plants, in winter. Resolutely would she turn to Mother Earth for the comfort denied her elsewhere.

Equal to its efficacy as a mind cure, is its effect for good on physical ills. Yet gardening as a remedial proposition is, unfortunately, not half so popular among us as patent medicines.

"In half an hour," says Charles Dudley Warner in "My Summer in a Garden," "I can hoe myself right away from this world as we commonly see it, into a large place where there are no obstacles." That "large place" should be the inheritance of all who can compass the use of a bit of earth, and to this end a taste for gardening should be encouraged among children. Whoever succeeds in planting in a child's mind a love for "the green things growing," deep enough to reach a willingness to work for them, makes for the greater happiness of one life throughout all its stages.

Gifts of seeds, roots and tools will help the little Adams and Eves to realize the delights of a Paradise which may lie, throughout the nineteenth century the growth of the system was slow. I recall the tours of Patti and Albani in the nineties. Despite the great prestige of these artists three or four other performers of various ranks were used as stop gaps. This was an unsatisfactory system; for the subordinate performer, however excellent, was overshadowed by the fame of the star and audiences paid inadequate attention to his efforts. I recall in Albani's forces, especially, names which now signify a very high musical eminence, like Landon Ronald, the pianist, conductor and composer, Tivadar Nachez a Hungarian violinist of high scholarship and eminence, and Muriel Foster, the beautiful contralto, who toured Canada with Albani and attracted little attention, solely because the public had come to hear Albani herself, and was indifferent to her associates. The old fashioned concert was unsatisfactory, both to the majority of performers, and promoted an inaccurate sense of artistic values, which the recital system has done much to correct.

THE advantage of the recital lies in the fact that an accomplished artist gets an opportunity to show various phases of his art. Thus if he be a singer he takes up an old English group perhaps, then a modern French group, then an operatic aria or two to show the full scope of his vocal powers, then a group of folk songs of various nationalities. By the time he is finished the listener has obtained a knowledge of various schools of song, and of the methods of interpretation necessary to give them proper expression, that was quite impossible in the old fashioned and showy mixed programmes. The same thing applies to instrumental recitals. In the latter field, the short programmes which are a desideratum of the average club function give especial opportunities to the violinist or the violoncellist of repute to show the more delicate and lyrical phases of his art.

I have already spoken of the special opportunities which the usual machinery of the women's musical club provides for the study of national schools or individual composers. New composers owe an incalculable debt to various clubs of America for the introduction of their works to public attention. It has been by such means, for instance, that the music of the modern French composers, Debussy and Ravel have been made known to the community at large. It is chiefly through such channels that the knowledge of the scientific yet emotionally beautiful music of Bach has become familiar to the public of to-day. Bach is an especial instance. In their very nature the works of this great composer were unsuitable to the conditions of the old fashioned mixed concert. Very recently this old composer as it were has come into his own in America, and it is entirely due to the recital form popularized by the women's musical clubs. Similarly the present widespread knowledge of the treasures of Russian song, which is being extended every day is due to this cause. The women's musical clubs in Canada have been the real pioneers of the new composers of excellence and also in directing attention to great men of the past whose music was neglected. That is to say, they have provided the opportunity by which ambitious artists were able to present such works, and without them the opportunity would not have existed.

This brings me to another and very important sphere of influence exercised by women's clubs. They have within the past quarter of a century offered a means of livelihood to a multitude of singers and musicians that in the past would have little room for their services, except in the depressing fields of continuous teaching. The vast increase in the number of recitals given on this continent in the course of an ordinary winter has promoted the development of a type of artist who need no longer look to the operatic stage or to the concert of the virtuosic order to realize his ambitions. I was glancing recently through Musical America's Guide, which contains the names and advertisements of countless soloists, and was struck by the fact that among singers it was no longer necessary to get a hearing in opera to attain to a highly remunerative and artistically recognized position. Many musicians of rare and sound accomplishment, seldom make a New York appearance but spend their whole time in giving recitals to local musical clubs in the smaller towns of America; thus constituting an educative influence of the first order. The club movement has also brought to the smaller towns world famous artists of a rank that in days gone by, never thought of appearing outside the greater cities. In the past twelve months some of the smaller towns of Ontario heard men like the great Canadian tenor, Edward Johnson, the wonderful Polish violinist, Kochanski and the famous Russian pianist, Siloti, to mention a few names at random. The towns of the Canadian West also hear many world famous artists, who but for the musical enthusiasm created by women's clubs would find it impossible to obtain the rewards to which their art and fame entitle them.

Finally, by way of advice, let me say that this present month of September should be the month of preparation. It is the month in which organization for the season's activities should be fully planned. Delays only make such organization or promotion work doubly difficult.

I never dreamed it was so easy —

"THE very thought of home-made clothes used to be distasteful to me because they seemed to lack the style and the professional touch of the experienced fitter, but a trial of the New Queen Adjustable Dress Form has changed my point of view. This is the opinion of thousands of well-dressed women who have solved the "clothes" problem in this way. ADJUSTABLE DRESS FORM

"A Lovely Skin Comes from Within"

—Say Physicians

A CLEAR, radiant, youthful complexion is the secret of personal attractiveness. Sparkling eyes, lustrous hair, the rich, glowing delicacy of the skin—these are the priceless reward of internal cleanliness.

Facial blemishes, muddy skin and sallowness can never be overcome unless the body is kept free of the poisons which cause them.

For, as a prominent medical skin specialist states, practically all skin imperfections, such as pimples, acne, and the like, are due to intestinal poisons resulting from constipation.

When the food waste is not regularly and thoroughly eliminated, poisons are formed in the intestines and absorbed into the blood by which they are carried to every body cell—the millions of cells that compose the skin, the roots of the hair, and the eyes. No wonder that through constipation the skin becomes sallow, muddy, roughened, blotched or disfigured with pimples or other blemishes, the eyes become dull and the hair lacks luster.

Experts have conducted exhaustive research to find some method of eliminating these poisons in a harmless and natural way. Laxatives and cathartics have failed to overcome the condition because, as a prominent specialist states, they provide temporary relief only, at the expense of permanent injury, and tend to aggravate the constipation which they are given to relieve.

Results of Research

The result of medical experience in treating thousands of cases has been the discovery that Nujol not only overcomes constipation by its gentle lubricating action (which closely resembles Nature's own lubricant) but has the unique property of dissolving readily many intestinal poisons; these it carries out of the body along with the food residue, and thus prevents their reaching the skin cells.

As Nujol is not a laxative it cannot gripe. It is not a medicine in any sense of the word and, like pure water, it is harmless. These facts have led to its adoption in leading hospitals throughout the world for the treatment of constipation and resulting ailments. Physicians consider it indispensable in treating skin disorders due to faulty elimination. Nujol has helped thousands of women to overcome complexion troubles and to regain the natural glow of perfect health.

Test Nujol yourself. For sale at any drug store.

CHILD WELFARE CENTRES.

At the Second English-Speaking Conference on Infant Welfare held in London, England, July 5-7th, 1921, in a paper on "The Ideal Centre" by Mrs. Kitson Clark, the accompanying "Plan" was presented, and it may be found helpful by those who are organizing a Child Welfare Centre. Not many places will have, or will need, all the accommodation shown in the "Plan," but we shall be better able to tell, after studying it, what will meet our own needs.

EQUIPMENT

Outside Notice Board: This "Sign-Board" should be large, and the announcement thereon should be clear and interesting.

Records: Records are important, and the necessary forms will doubtless be provided by the Medical Officer of Health. They should be simple. Any attempt to record too much defeats its own end. The card index system is by far the best.

General Equipment: Running water, toilet facilities, gas or electric light and good daylight, have already been mentioned; in addition there should be two screens, and enough seats for the mothers, as well as one or more cribs for the babies.

Doctor's Room: The Doctor will need a high bed, or an Examining Table with a pad or pillow, and another table or desk. Urinalysis facilities are also needed; rubber gloves, a covered garbage pail, also sterilizer, scissors, thermometers, medicine glass, glass jars, large and small; basins, large and small.

Outside Room: This room needs: Chair; Desk; Blotting pad; Ink-well; Pen; Pencil; Rubber bands; Ruler; Waste basket; Map of City, Town or County

Linen: Sheets; Pillow cases; Doctor's gowns; Dusters; Gowns for patients; Covers for tables; Laundry bags; Towels.

Drugs: Lysol; Green soap; Boroglycerine; Alcohol; Iodine; Albolene.

Sewing Bag: Spool "No. 70"; Spool "No. 30"; Needles, assorted; Thimble; Tape measure; Tape; Safety Pins; Plain Pins.

Toilet Tray: Jar of boiled water (for washing mother's nipples); Jar of oil (mineral oil best); Jar of boric solution,

The Book Corner

Dr. J. D. Logan, Lecturer on Canadian Literature, Acadia University, has written a sympathetic and discriminating estimate of the poetic genius and art of Marjorie Pickthall in a booklet recently issued by T. C. Allen and Co., Halifax, (Price $1.00). The author is a scholarly and discerning critic, who approaches his task in an analytic but almost reverential spirit. Dr. Logan finds in Miss Pickthall's work an exquisite artistry which gives her a place near such writers as Mrs. Meynell and Christina Rossetti. We may not agree with all that Dr. Logan has said regarding the qualities of Miss Pickthall's poetry, especially as to the mystic element; but the very stimulation which comes from a sense of difference of opinion is something for which we are grateful. Dr. Logan's "appreciation" is a valuable piece of writing on a subject which he has made his favorite topic:—the poetic art of a true singer.

Sir James Barrie, Rector of St. Andrews University, Scotland, delivered a rectorial address on May third, which is now published as a booklet by Hodder and Stoughton, Ltd., Toronto, (price sixty cents). The subject, "Courage," is treated as only the author of "Peter Pan" and "The Little Minister" could deal with such a theme and is a source of high and quiet inspiration. Barrie does not beat the big drum. His is the music of a silver trumpet and its echoes should linger long. He gives an invaluable extract from a letter written by the great explorer, Scott, as he was facing the white death of the Antarctic snows. "How comely a thing," says the Rector who wrote "Peter Pan," "is affliction borne cheerfully, which is not beyond the reach of the humblest of us. What is beauty? It is these hard-bitten men singing courage to you from their tent, it is the waves of their island home, crooning of their deeds to you who are to follow them. Sometimes beauty boils over and then spirits are abroad." There are a few instances of careless proof-reading, such as "them" on page 33 and "bodily" on page 35 which we should hardly expect to find in a book:—and that book containing a Barrie address. This little volume is a bit of literature and we are sure that the students of St. Andrews will wear the red gown with a better grace for having heard the address.

"Mortimer's Gold," by Harold Horn, (published by Hodder and Stoughton, Toronto, price $1.75) is a dashing tale of adventure which the Canadian youth might well enjoy. Of course, when we are whisked off, in a tale of adventure, we expect to be taken to the South Seas or to the North Pole, and we are, therefore, highly surprised when we find that the scene of the hero's adventures is an island out in Lake Huron, which, of course, is supposed to have a hidden treasure. The hero is a returned soldier, with the feudal-sounding name, Lieutenant Richard Mortimer, who discovers that his great grand-father, who had been murdered at Mackinaw more than a hundred years ago, had concealed gold dust and coins, somewhere on this almost-inaccessible Station Island which has remained in possession of the family. There is a wonderful heroine who, following the approved plan, gets into danger and falls into the clutches of two super-villains, the Jeromes. How the gold and the girl finally fall to the hero's lot is a story which cannot fail to please those who like good old-fashioned romance.

"Canadian Girls in Training" is described in sub-title as "A Book for Leaders," and is prepared by the National Girls' Work Board of the Religious Education Council of Canada. This is a valuable and practical book for the girl who wishes to carry out ideals of service and progress. The frontispiece is a reproduction of a memorial in Wellesley College, United States. It is a pity that Canadian art did not afford an opening illustration for such a volume. (Published in Toronto by the Ryerson Press. Price, $1.00).

"Indian Legends of Vancouver Island," by Alfred Carmichael, illustrated by J. Semeyn, is a book of picturesque interest, which fulfils the promise in the preface:—"The legends indicate the poetry that lies hidden in the folk lore of the British Columbia Coast Indian tribes." (Published by the Musson Book Co., Ltd., Toronto.)

"The Bible for School and Home," by Rev. J. Paterson Smyth, LL.D., of Montreal, is a series of volumes, written in the modern spirit, with due regard to the requirements of the young reader. This is highly sensible advice for the teacher of religious truths to the young: "Try to make him talk. Make the lesson conversational. Don't preach." These books, five in number, are commentaries prepared expressly for use in the Week Day Church School, the Sunday School, and the Home. The books will be of especial interest and value to the teacher and the parent. (Published by the Musson Book Co., Ltd., Toronto. Price, $1.35 a volume).

Are you tired of cow-boys and slang and the deeds which look well in a Wild West movie? Then do not read "Rangy Pete," by Guy Morton, which is of the usual type in hairbreadth-adventure story of those regions where law and order mean less than a readiness with the revolver. However, as you advance in the story, "Rangy Pete" becomes positively likable and you decide that he is "different." There is a love story, of course, and the heroine is a most unconventional and startling person, with the bluest eyes that ever bewildered a bandit tribe. The opening scene, where Dervisher Dick's band attacks the would-be peaceful hamlet of Triple Butte, and leaves, only when threatened by the approach of Rough House Dan Merrill and his troop from the "Snaky Y" indicates sufficiently the nature of the narrative. There is certainly film material in the excitement which follows the double visit to Triple Butte. Incidentally, there is a box of evaporated apples which plays a thrilling part in various raids and stirs up enough strife to make the reader suspect that the original apples came from an arboreal descendant of the tree which grew in Eden. (Published in Toronto by McClelland and Stewart. Price, $1.75).

Pertaining to Pickles

BY FRANCES M. McNALLY

SOME nutrition specialists claim that pickles have no place in the diet. It is true that they have little nutritive value, but they furnish a relish with a simple dinner that is of much use, for food does us more good when eaten with an appetite. It is commonly conceded that they should not be included in the diet of children or those of delicate digestion but there is certainly no harm in the moderate use of good pickles for most adult persons.

Pickling is preserving with salt or vinegar, usually with the addition of spices and condiments. Because acids attack metal utensils causing the formation of dangerous compounds which may be imparted to the pickles, only porcelain lined or agate kettles should be used for cooking. A wooden spoon should be used for stirring and a perforated agate ladle for lifting the pickles from the kettle.

Green vegetables and slightly unripe fruits are generally used for pickling. Some vegetables give better results if they are soaked in salt water (brine) over night or until they are cured. Brine in which vegetables for pickles are to be kept simply over night should be in the proportion of one cup of salt to one gallon of water. If the vegetables are to be kept in the brine for a longer time, the proportion should be two cups of salt to one gallon of water. Finished pickles should be packed into sterilized jars or crocks.

MIXED PICKLES. Four quarts green tomatoes, one quart onions, eighteen large green peppers, twelve red peppers, four quarts cabbage, one cup salt, one cup mustard seed, one cup celery seed, four quarts vinegar, two pounds brown sugar. Remove seeds from peppers. Chop tomatoes, onions, cabbage and peppers. Add one cup of salt and mix well. Cover with water and let stand over night. In the morning, drain. Boil vinegar and sugar for twenty minutes and pour over drained vegetables. Add mustard and celery seed and cook until tomatoes are soft.

MUSTARD PICKLES. One quart small green cucumbers, two heads cauliflower, two small red peppers, one quart small onions, two tablespoons mustard, one tablespoon tumeric powder, two cups sugar, one cup flour, two and one-half quarts vinegar. Break the cauliflower in flowerlets, remove seeds from peppers and chop fine. Peel onions and wash cucumbers. Combine all the vegetables and put in brine for twenty-four hours. Then cook in same brine until tender and drain. Mix dry ingredients with water to make a smooth paste. Add vinegar, boiling hot, cook until creamy and pour over vegetables. Cook altogether for ten minutes. Seal in jars.

SWEET CUCUMBER PICKLES. Two quarts small green cucumbers, one-half cup salt, boiling water to cover, two pounds sugar, one pint vinegar, two tablespoons whole cloves, four inches stick cinnamon. Clean the cucumbers, put them in a crock, sprinkle with the salt and cover with the boiling water. Let stand over night. Make a syrup by boiling for five minutes the sugar, vinegar and spices (tied in a bag). Add the cucumbers and cook ten minutes. Remove cucumbers to a stone jar and pour over them the syrup.

SACO PICKLE. Wash and wipe small fresh green cucumbers and pack them in glass jars. Sift together one cup sugar, one cup salt, three quarters cup mustard. Add slowly, while stirring constantly one quart vinegar. When smooth add three quarts vinegar. Pour this mixture over the cucumbers, having the liquid fill the jars to overflowing. Seal.

RIPE CUCUMBER PICKLE. Ten large ripe cucumbers, two pounds sugar, one quart vinegar, two teaspoons cinnamon, one teaspoon cloves. Pare and seed the cucumbers and cut each in quarters, lengthwise. Cover with vinegar and let stand twenty-four hours in a cool place then drain. Boil vinegar, sugar and spices together for twenty minutes. Remove spices and add drained cucumbers. Cook in the syrup until tender. When soft pack cucumbers in hot jars. Cook syrup down until thick enough to stiffen when dropped on cold saucer and pour it hot over cucumbers. Seal and keep six months before opening.

PICKLED WATERMELON RIND. Rind of one watermelon, three pints vinegar, five pounds sugar, two ounces whole mace, two ounces whole clove. Pare the rind of watermelon (do not use pink part) and cut it in one-inch pieces. Cover with equal parts vinegar and water and let stand for twelve hours. Boil in the same solution, until tender and drain well. Boil together the sugar, vinegar and spices (in a bag) for five minutes. Remove spice bag and cook the melon rind in this syrup for five minutes. Remove rind from syrup and pack in hot jars. Boil syrup down until quite thick, pour over rind in jars and seal while hot.

CORN RELISH. One dozen ears of corn, one head cabbage, three sweet red peppers, three sweet green peppers, one quart vinegar, one cup sugar, two tablespoons mustard, one tablespoon salt, one tablespoon celery salt. Blanch corn for two minutes, dip in cold water and cut from cob. Cook all ingredients together for twenty minutes. Pack into sterilized jars and seal.

CHILI SAUCE. One gallon chopped ripe tomatoes, one-half cup chopped white onions, one-half cup sweet green peppers chopped, one-half cup chopped sweet red peppers, one-half cup brown sugar, two tablespoons ginger, one tablespoon cinnamon, one tablespoon mustard, one nutmeg (grated), one quart vinegar, one-half cup salt, one-half teaspoon cayenne pepper. Peel tomatoes and onions and chop onions and pepper fine. Boil all ingredients except the vinegar, together for two hours or until soft. Add vinegar and simmer for one hour, stirring frequently. Bottle and seal while hot.

CELERY RELISH. Three pints chopped green tomatoes, three pints chopped ripe tomatoes, two and one-half pints chopped onions, two bunches celery chopped, two red peppers. Mix all ingredients together, add one-half cup salt and let stand over night. Drain and add two quarts vinegar, four cups sugar, one-half teaspoon each cinnamon and cloves and one-half cup mustard seed. Cook one-half hour. Pack in sterilized jars and seal.

SWEET PICKLED CHERRIES. Three quarts cherries, two pounds sugar, three cups vinegar, one-quarter teaspoon ground cloves, one-half teaspoon cinnamon. Remove cherry pits. Combine vinegar, sugar and spices and cook until syrup is thick. Pour over cherries and simmer for three minutes. Let stand over night and cook again for ten minutes. Pack in sterilized jars and seal.

SWEET PICKLED CRAB APPLES. Seven pounds crab apples, one pint water, one quart vinegar, three pounds sugar, two tablespoons whole cloves. Boil sugar, water, and vinegar ten minutes. Add cloves and crabapples. Cook until apples are tender but not soft. Pack into jars. Cook syrup until thick and fill jars to overflowing with hot syrup. Seal airtight.

SWEET PEACH PICKLE. Eight pounds peaches, four pounds brown sugar, one quart vinegar, one teaspoon allspice, six whole cloves, stick cinnamon. Put spices in bag. Make syrup of sugar and vinegar. Add spice bag and cook until syrup is thick. Peel and stone peaches and cook in syrup until soft. Remove peaches from syrup and pack in jars. Pour over them the syrup. Next day drain off syrup and boil again until thick and return to peaches. Repeat process three days.

ONE Real Dye For ALL Fabrics

Precious Things

BY M. A. MULIKIN

IN an out-of-the-way church of a small Italian town, the attendant handed me an index of its contents, the "cose preziose" (precious things) in possession of the church. They were worth cherishing, these bits of carving and bronze casting, though their makers' fame has scarcely reached beyond their native town.

Suppose one of our present-day cities should be arrested in its development, as was the case with this Italian town, and should be preserved, with all its contents, as it now is, a spectacle to our descendants. Precious things! What do you own that you caress with word and look and touch?

Not long ago, I attempted to buy a bowl and pitcher for my wash-stand. Until then, I had hardly realized the grotesque shapes and decorations offered us. Cheap and expensive alike were hideous. I was in a real quandary. Could I consent to see and handle daily, to grow accustomed and callous to such deformities? I compromised on a pitcher for drinking-water and a salad-bowl of 'willow pattern.'

Thus, at my home, we attempt to exercise a strict censorship over everything that enters our door. Yet there is an "open sesame"—the fatal words: "It is a gift." Opening some packages we exclaim: "Wasn't it sweet for her to remember us?" Presently we ask: "What shall we do with it?" and the most courageous suggests: "Can't some accident happen to it?"

If you come into possession of a vase, for instance, caught in the plight of ugliness, why not treat it with the same courageous kindness you would a sick dog—put it out of its misery!

Perhaps you are asking: "Why should we be so particular? Why not buy and give, and receive and furnish with and live with, just what the shops offer us?"

But the shops, you know, will furnish us with just what we demand. Do you remember the standard-bearer who, some hundred yards in advance of his regiment, responded to his Colonel's call: "Bring back that standard," with the retort: "Bring up your regiment to the standard!"

A small proportion of our time is spent in real thinking; more time in doing; but I believe with most of us the largest proportion of our days is spent in a more or less unconscious seeing, feeling, and hearing. And this receptiveness of the senses builds soul-tissue, just as food establishes the tissues of the body. Shall we take narcotics, opiates, and poisons in the form of sofa-cushions with "Gibson's Widow" on them; plates where painted fruits are more conspicuous and try to be more real than the luscious ripeness served upon them; "Turkish corners" so crowded that they allow no room for would-be occupants?

Furnish a room with lights and shadows! I watch them walk with slow, majestic tread from morning to night across my small, but spacious floor. When these senses of ours grow keen to such beauty, we shall be free from "the tyranny of things;" we shall "know how to appreciate art." Money is useless in our hands until we have learned the standard of values inherent in Nature. A beautiful home is always within the power of one who can feel an absolute emotion of joy at the aspect of things so simple as lights and shadows. Otherwise, millions of money could only, as it were, raise the ugliness of one's surroundings to a higher power.

Walter Pater translates a rule of Plato in some such words as these:

"If thou wouldst have all about thee like the colours of some fresh picture, in a clear light—keep the eye clear by a sort of exquisite alacrity and cleanliness, extending even to the dwelling-place; discriminate ever more and more fastidiously, select form and colour in things from what is less select; meditate much on beautiful visible objects; keep ever by thee if it were but a single choice flower, a graceful animal or sea-shell."

There is no single case on record over a period of 14 years where the regular use of The Hoover has harmed a rug

"We Always Recommend The Hoover"

The best authorities on the proper care of floor coverings are manufacturers of rugs and carpets. It is significant that, for years, leading firms in the industry have strongly endorsed The Hoover. Space forbids quoting them all.

The makers of the popular Bundhar Wiltons, Hardwick & Magee Co., Philadelphia, state "We always recommend The Hoover to inquiring customers." Incidentally this prominent firm has itself used The Hoover for ten years.

The makers of the well known Hartford-Saxony rugs, Bigelow-Hartford Carpet Co., New York City, advise, "We consider that a brush is a very important feature of a suction sweeper and fail to see how any valid objection can be raised against the (Beating-Sweeping) brush used in The Hoover. Our opinion is that The Hoover is not injurious for use on fine Velvet, Axminster, Body Brussels or Wilton rugs."

H. G. Fetterolf Company, Philadelphia, manufacturers of Fetterolf Quality Wiltons, say: "Many times during the past year we have been asked to give advice on how to take care of Fetterolf Quality Wilton Rugs. In each instance we have recommended the use of The Hoover Suction Sweeper, which we believe is the most efficient rug cleaner on the market today. A rug free from dirt will give longer service and wear. That's why we recommend The Hoover."

Have an immediate free home demonstration of The Hoover and its new attachments. On our divided payment plan, 22c a day soon pays for a Hoover. Write for names of Authorized Dealers—the only dealers licensed to demonstrate, sell and service Hoovers backed by our Guarantee Bond.

A man called Lazarus changed his name by deed-poll to Arbuthnot. A few weeks later he again visited his solicitor and paid a second fee to change his name again to Howard.

"Why did you want to change your name a second time?" asked the puzzled solicitor.

"Why, don't you see?" came the answer. "People will look at me and ask me what my name was before it was Howard, and I shall be able to tell 'em it was Arbuthnot!"

A Secret Marriage

in the heart of the childless woman. He must have come an awful cropper—she lapsed into slang—to look like that. It was something more than Reuben Simon could help him out of. It was evident his thoughts were miserable and wandering. She wanted to call out to him to look up, to be hopeful, to leave the past behind him and begin again. In the lamplight he looked ridiculously young, a little golden moustache just coming on his lip—very young and very miserable. Her heart ached with sympathy as she watched him so that she forgot the affront of his look at her girl.

Reuben Simon was more excited than she had ever seen him—quietly excited, for it was not his way to be noisy. He kept nodding to the servant to fill Lord Askdale's glass with champagne. Presently under the influence of the wine the colour came to the young man's cheek and his eyes lost something of their sullen misery. He began to talk a little, and it was obvious that he could be merry and pleasant.

His host watched him with a curiously steady observation from under his heavy brows. He drank no wine himself, and when the ladies left the table he made no suggestion of remaining in the dining-room after them. In the drawing-room he sat down, the gloomy young guest at the piano. It was evident from the first chord that Lord Askdale was a musician. He began to play, wandering on from one thing to another. He was playing something from the Valkyrie that wailed and sobbed like the wind on a desolate night, when Reuben Simon made a movement inviting Mrs. Seymour to follow him into the little book-room that opened off the drawing-room.

She got up, more than half unwillingly. Vashti was leaning forward in her chair, gazing into the red heart of the fire, under the spell of the music. She would hardly know that they left her.

When they had passed into the book-room Mr. Simon closed the door behind him and faced Mrs. Seymour. He burst out with a question as though he had hardly been able to contain it.

"What do you think of him?"

"He looks very wretched."

"To be sure. He's been finding out that there's such a thing as Dead Sea fruit in the world. At the present moment he's thoroughly sick of everything. A woman in the case, of course. A worthless woman, and the young fool was idiot enough to believe in her. It would have been a pretty thing if his debts went home to his father in Scotland—an austere, pious gentleman, the Earl of Noland. And the Countess very delicate: too good for this world. The shock of learning her son's adventures would probably kill her. Bad lives both. Lord Noland had never recovered from an attack of pneumonia he had in New York three winters ago. Fortunately for the lad, I've got all his I.O.U.'s and post-obits in my hands. I propose to commit them to the flames in the hour that sees Vashti Lady Askdale."

Mrs. Seymour was startled, although she had expected something of the sort.

"Mr. Simon," she said, "you horrify me! Poor Vashti! I'm sure she doesn't want to marry anyone; and the young man doesn't look like a bridegroom. I've a right to speak. Vashti has become very dear to me. I can't see her handed over like this to a stranger, one who has been running amok, without a protest. Why do you think of such a thing—a tender father like you, a man of sense? You can scarcely be dazzled by the young man's title."

Reuben Simon watched her with an air of untroubled good humour.

"The lad's only been a fool," he said, "not a blackguard. I've always foreseen something like this. I want Vashti to leave her old father and his trade behind, to be a fine lady. That's why I gave her over to you. I meant to marry her well. I haven't a good life myself any more than Lord Noland.

I've had bad attacks lately—of what I told you about. There's a wonderful new drug which will help me to get through this visit without frightening Vashti out of her life. The young man will make her a good husband when he gets over the shock of discovering the base metal of which his idol was made. She plucked him pretty clean, I will say that for her. He's had a hard lesson. He'll come back to Vashti one of these days, prepared to make her happy."

"Does he know your plans for him?"

"He knows. He doesn't like it; but he likes even less certain documents going to his father and mother. He will like it, one of these days. Vashti's going to be a beauty. She doesn't show it yet. I propose to marry them as soon as possible, but I don't propose to make the marriage public. I propose to let him see the world. One of these days he'll come back and find Vashti a beauty, and fall in love with her. I'm not an unnatural father. If he wasn't a decent sort of youth he shouldn't have my Vashti if he were twenty times the future Earl of Noland. You don't know how many golden youths, a future Duke among them, I've turned down as possible husbands for my girl. There's method in my madness, Mrs. Seymour."

"You think Vashti will be willing."

His brows darkened in a frown.

"If she is ready to disobey her father the first time he asks for her obedience, you haven't been doing your duty by her, ma'am," he said. "I will only ask you to stand aside. Vashti will be willing enough for me. The young man is unwilling, but before he and Vashti keep house together he will be willing enough."

* * *

A few weeks later there was a quiet wedding in an obscure London church on a cold January morning. The poor little bride looked leaden-coloured when she had emerged in her white satin, and the lace train, which had belonged to an Empress, from her cloak of ermine. It had been her father's wish that she should be married in full bridal splendour. Nothing could have become her worse than the dead white of the satin, the cold glimmer of the diamonds with which he had loaded her. She looked weighed down, oppressed, by all the splendour.

The bridegroom looked sullenly unhappy, and scarcely glanced at his bride. The old man who married them hurried through the service. He had come to the wedding from a grave-side, and his nose was red and his eyes watered as he went through the words of the marriage-service, interrupted now and again by a violent sneeze or fit of coughing. It was a poor little church, and the offering he received, over and above the marriage fees from the bride's father, sent him, as soon as the wedding was over, hurrying as fast as his old feet would carry him, across the crowded London churchyard to the dingy little house where his wife sat, making flannel shirts for the poor. Together they rejoiced in Reuben Simon's lavish generosity.

Bride and bridegroom parted at the church-door; the bridegroom scurrying into a hansom with indecent haste. He was going to make a tour of the world at Reuben Simon's expense. His debts were all paid. There was no longer the terror of the elderly couple in their Scottish castle who had never desired the husks of swine, and would have been broken indeed if they had known that their only boy had for a while found the downward way alluring. It was thanks to Reuben Simon that he had been turned back comparatively unharmed. The man had no resentment when his new-made son-in-law turned his back on his bride in so evident a hurry to be gone.

He could trust Time. Vashti was going to be a nobly beautiful woman. Now she was an immature girl, not to be thrust into the arms of an unwilling groom. It is the way of the race to be patient. Time, who brings all things, would bring a willing bridegroom to a beautiful bride.

Vashti went back to the cottage with Mrs. Seymour, and continued her quiet, uneventful life as though nothing had happened. The secret was well kept, till one day some four years after the clandestine marriage, when Reuben Simon, opening his paper, read of the deaths, within a few hours of each other, of the Earl and Countess of Noland. The newspaper mentioned casually that the new Earl was somewhere in the East; he had travelled a great deal since attaining his majority, and had only made one or two brief appearances in England. The news would be conveyed to him as soon as his address could be discovered. It was a sad circumstance that Lord Noland should have been absent at such a time, and many people would feel sorry for him.

So far the newspaper. Reuben Simon folded the paper, and put it in his pocket. He walked down to Lincoln's Inn Fields, sought an interview with the senior partner in the firm of solicitors who handled Lord Noland's business. Mr. Morgan and he had met before—over other people's business; and his preposterous assertion of his daughter's being the Countess of Noland, although it made the little old lawyer drop his gold-rimmed eye-glass in his amazement, was yet received with more respect than it would have been if Reuben Simon were not fabulously rich.

Indeed, when Mr. Morgan had got over the first shock of the announcement, he began to see the guiding hand of Providence in the fact that the new Earl had married the only child of a fabulously rich man, albeit a money-lender, rather than one of the light-footed ladies from behind the footlights. The Noland property was encumbered, if Mr. Simon's daughter was at all presentable—and the daughter of so remarkable a man might well be—then the marriage might have much to recommend it.

Anyhow, the proofs were incontrovertible. It hardly needed Lord Noland's letter in which he acknowledged his Countess, and asked that she should take up her residence in one of the houses that were hers by right, to convince them.

For a little while the secret marriage of Lord Noland made a sensation; then was forgotten for other and more immediate things. She did as her husband wished her, and took up her residence at the house in the great London square, which had been long shut up and its furniture swathed in holland, because the late Earl and Countess had no taste for town gaieties. But Society saw very little of her; and she was still further retired from the world by the period of mourning following her father's death, which took place within a year.

When she really did appear there was the profoundest amazement over her husband's indifference, for she was lovely; she was young; she was immensely rich; she was reported sweet as she was virtuous. What could the man be made of that he should keep away from her?

A great many people would have been glad to make much of the young Countess, who was treated with such unheard-of coldness by her husband; but she could not be tempted out of the solitude of the great house in the square unless it might be to visit the Scotch castle, or the smaller, more homely Sussex house which belonged to her husband. For occupation she had her good tasks, which were many and various; she had the restoration of her husband's houses, which were all in a sad state of disrepair and shabbiness.

When she was in town she visited the theatres a good deal. Especially she adored music, and rarely missed a night of the opera season, and in this way became known by sight not only to fashionable folk, but to a great many ordinary people as well. But she refused all entertainments, and was to be seen nowhere but at church or at the theatre, although she might often have been met afoot in the most unlikely places, dreary, poverty-stricken quarters of London, where no one knew her as the Countess of Noland, but a great many as a beneficent angel.

It might have been three years from his succeeding to the title when Lord Noland came home. He had remained away so long out of an unconquerable aversion to the girl he had married. He had done his duty by her so far as was consistent with his desertion of her. He had given instructions that all that belonged to the honour and dignity of his wife should be rendered to her. For the rest he forgot her when he could, solacing himself with the friendship of other ladies since he might not have their love. There was something of the Puritan strain in him which forbade his forgetting his distasteful marriage as completely as a less scrupulous man would have done.

It was one of those ladies for whom he had a warm friendship, a high-minded and serious great lady, who awakened his conscience to the wrong he was inflicting upon his young wife. He had not considered that aspect of it, having said to himself, on the contrary, many times that other men would have tried to break the marriage. Lady Esmeré's presentation of the case staggered him. He had been very happy basking in her friendship, a safe friendship, since no one questioned her love for her husband. When she bade him go back to England and his distasteful bride he found it a hard saying.

Nevertheless he went; and on the voyage home he tried to stir some pity in himself, since he could not awaken love, for the poor little soul as he called her. He had a vivid memory of the miserable wedding morning, and the leaden face of the bride. But, after all, it was not her fault that she was plain and dull. He owed something to her, for she had dealt generously by him, and he had had reports from Mr. Morgan of the money she was spending on his property. After all, she was the child of a very uncommon man. No one knew better than Lord Noland how much of the element of greatness there was in Reuben Simon, the money-lender. He had not sat at Lady Esmeré's feet for nothing. All the homeward voyage he was bracing himself to do his duty by the poor girl who bore his name. It was not so happy for her, tied to a man who had obstinately, for years, kept the width of the world between them. He made up his mind that he would do his best by his wife for the future without letting her see what the effort cost him.

* * *

HE arrived at Southampton on a grey day after Christmas, which reminded him forcibly of the day of his wretched marriage. As he travelled up to London he debated within himself whether he should present himself that evening at the house in the square where Lady Noland might or might not be staying. Finally he decided to wait another day. He felt strangely lonely and out of the world; a Rip Van Winkle whom nobody would be expecting. The grey misery of the London streets depressed his spirits, new from the gorgeous East. He thought of his club, and decided against it; of this or that old friend who might be in town and very glad to welcome him back from the shades. But no; his first visit must be paid to his wife. To-morrow. He was glad of the day's respite. There were various things he had to do. Finally he put up at a quiet hotel, and decided to spend the evening at a theatre.

It suited his mood, not wishing to be recognised, to seat himself in an obscure corner of the house, amid humble folk. It was a night when Ellen Terry was playing, and the theatre was crowded. He was very glad of his obscure, ill-lit corner as he considered how many people might yet remember him, after an absence of three years. He wanted to get used to things, to become less strange before anyone out of his old life should recognise him.

An obliging young man of the small clerk class, who was his neighbour, gave him information about various things. Apparently the young man was a great playgoer, and he was quite well-pleased to talk to the "toff" whose proper place would have been in the stalls or boxes, although he had chosen the pit. He was able to tell the names of many of the celebrities present, and to impart bits of their history, which he did very affably.

Lord Noland listened, amused and slightly interested. As his opera-glass swept the boxes and the parterre, in obedience to the amiable young man's behests, he was suddenly confronted by a face the beauty of which struck him dumb. It was a little face and pale; and it leant on a little hand with an air of great sadness. It was framed in heavy dark hair, out of which it shone like the face of a saint or angel sad for

The visitor took a chair behind her in the back of the box. She turned about sweetly, whispering:

"Who is it?" "I don't recognize you in the darkness."

"Your husband."

Her heart leaped, but there was no sign of a tremor in the way the graceful head was turned towards him. He could see it dimly, and a dim glistening of her jewels against the darkness of the house. He could see that she laid a finger on her lip.

"Hush!" she said in a soft whisper. "After all these years you can be patient a little longer."

* * *

When the curtain fell, and the house was once more blazing with light, "My patience has quite come to an end," he said, and forgot how he had disliked her. "I have so much to say to you. Need we wait? You are living at the square?"

Obediently she rose and followed him. In the corridor he arranged her cloak about her shoulders, with an air as though he had been doing it during those lost years in which he had rendered les

"Adorable woman!" he said. "I am punished enough, remembering that during those years which I never can recover I might have been going home—like this."

Pertaining to Pickles

SPICED PICKLED GRAPES: Weigh seven pounds of grapes and separate pulp from skins. Simmer pulp until soft and rub through a sieve to remove the seeds. Add the skins and four pounds of sugar, one pint vinegar, one nutmeg, grated, one and one-half tablespoons ground cinnamon and one tablespoon ground cloves. Let the whole simmer gently for two hours. Pour into sterilized jars and seal.

PICKLED STRING BEANS. Select tender beans, keep them full length, but snip off the ends and remove the strings, if present. Cover the beans with brine, one-fourth cup salt to one quart water and let stand over night. Drain, rinse in cold water and dry on a cloth. Pack the beans in sterilized jars, adding a chili pepper, here and there. For each quart jar take a quart of vinegar, half a cup of brown sugar, a teaspoon mustard seed, and one-half teaspoon celery seed; heat to boiling point and fill each jar to overflowing. Seal as canned food.

DIXIE RELISH. One quart chopped cabbage, one pint chopped white onions, one pint sweet red peppers, one pint chopped sweet green peppers, five tablespoons salt, four tablespoons mustard seed, two tablespoons celery seed, three-quarters cup sugar, one quart cider vinegar. Remove seeds and coarse white sections from peppers, and put through meat grinder. Soak in brine for twenty-four hours and drain. Chop cabbage, onions and peppers before measuring. Combine and add spices, sugar, and vinegar. Let stand over night in a covered crock. Pack in sterilized jars, adjust rubber, cover, and partly seal. Process for fifteen minutes.

INDIA CHOW CHOW: One-half peck ripe tomatoes, one-quarter peck green tomatoes, one quart green cucumbers, three small red peppers, three quarts small white onions, one head cauliflower, one bunch celery. Peel and slice the cucumbers, break the cauliflower into flowerlets and chop green tomatoes. Cut celery in small pieces, peel onions and remove seeds from peppers and chop them fine. Combine these six vegetables and put to soak in brine for twenty-four hours. Cook for twenty minutes and drain thoroughly. Make a mustard sauce of the following ingredients, two quarts vinegar, six tablespoons mustard, one tablespoon tumeric powder, one cup flour, one tablespoon celery seed, one tablespoon mustard seed, one teaspoon curry powder, two cups sugar. Mix dry ingredients in a large bowl, with a little cold water to form a smooth paste. Add vinegar, boiling hot, and cook over hot water, stirring constantly until creamy. Peel ripe tomatoes and add to the drained vegetables. Pour mustard sauce over the combined vegetables and cook until tomatoes are soft. Bottle while hot.

RED CABBAGE PICKLE. Select small hard heads of red cabbage, remove the outer imperfect leaves, cut in quarters and remove hard centres. Lay the quarters of cabbage in a stone jar, in layers, sprinkling each layer with salt. Let stand twenty-four hours. Drain off the brine, cover with cold water and let stand twelve hours. Drain off the water and measure it. Pack cabbage in a clean dry jar, sprinkling in whole cloves, mace, and white mustard seed. Scald as much vinegar as water poured off cabbage, pour this hot over the cabbage, cover and store in a cool place. Half a cup of sugar may be added to the vinegar if desired. The cabbage will be ready for use in a month.

The reasons why so many prospective builders do not make their dreams of the unusual house come true are not far to seek, and are seldom valid, though they appear to come from psychological and economic sources.

the sorrows of the world. The face and the dark hair were thrown into relief against the scarlet with which the box was lined. The lady was dressed in white. There were diamonds in her ears and about her neck, where they lay like a river of light. She was like a star. Lord Noland could scarce bear to withdraw his glasses while he asked his companion who the lady was.

"Why, that is the beautiful Countess of Noland," said the man. "They say her husband keeps away from her, will have none of her. What stuff do you think he's made of, sir?"

"Mud or clay," returned Lord Noland, to the young man's mystification: "that is to say, if mud or clay can become inflammable."

Lord Noland slipped away, so quietly that his neighbour was unaware that he had gone.

The door of Lady Noland's box was opened, and someone came in. At first she saw only a tall figure, broad-shouldered, and a closely cropped head. The lights went down, and for a second she was startled. It was like, but, of course, that was impossible. Some acquaintance had sought her out.

petits soins to other women. No one could have suspected how their hearts were beating, though the officials standing about might have wondered at their leaving the theatre before the conclusion of the play.

They stood side by side under the portico waiting for their carriage—their carriage—till the coachman was found. The lights in the wind-blown street lit up her face in the shadow of her hood, and there were sudden roses in her cheeks. Her eyes were shining like steadfast stars.

The coachman was an old family servant. He looked in amazement at the gentleman accompanying Lady Noland—recognised him and touched his hat. Lord Noland handed his wife into the carriage, which was driven off rapidly.

They were quite oblivious of the wet and the wind of the uncomfortable night. The too careless bridegroom had taken the bride in his arms.

"I have fallen desperately in love with my own wife," he whispered. "Can you ever forgive me?"

"I have always been in love with you," she returned, "only so sad because you

Pompeian Night Cream

The Cold Cream for Beauty

Beauty's Reward

His eyes rest tenderly upon her lovely, glowing beauty. Upon her dainty finger he slips the crowning jewel of her happiness—the sparkling solitaire that proclaims his love. Such is the reward of beauty. And she holds the secret of lasting youth and girlish loveliness.

For every night before retiring she uses Pompeian NIGHT Cream (the cold cream for beauty). It brings while she sleeps the beauty of a soft, youthful skin.

Just try this simple treatment every night before retiring: First, coat your face thickly with Pompeian NIGHT Cream, patting it gently into the pores. Then, with a soft cloth remove the surplus cream, which will bring with it all the day's dust and grit.

Next, wring out a cloth or towel in warm water and lay it on the face. Pat it gently—do not rub. Now, rinse the face in cool—not cold—water. Dry without rubbing.

Then again apply Pompeian NIGHT Cream (the cold cream for beauty), and leave it on the skin to "youthify" you through the night. It brings beauty while you sleep.

Pompeian NIGHT Cream is for sale at all druggists' at 50c and $1.00 a jar.

GUARANTEE

The name Pompeian on any package is your guarantee of quality and safety. Should you not be completely satisfied, the purchase price will be gladly refunded by The Pompeian Co., at Walkerville, Ontario, Canada.

Go to the best store you know; there you will be correctly fitted to a Gossard by a trained corsetiere who will know just how to idealize your figure. Or if you feel you have a very special corset problem and you'd like a bit of personal advice, write to Miss Jane Hill, the Gossard corset and clothing specialist, at the home offices, whose years of experience and proven ability are at your service.

VERY few of us are utterly beautiful in proportion—and even if we are, it won't last unless we work at it. Let's be personal; let's talk as plainly and practically as we can. Get out your tape line, find an obliging friend to measure you and then locate your figure type by means of the old Greek measurements for determining the ideal average figure. To be sure, modern life has evolved a lighter, slimmer type for the young girl who goes in for athletics, but when she is no longer slim nineteen, she, too, will join the large majority of us for whom this old rule still holds good. By common agreement of artists the ideally perfect woman should be 5 feet, 5 inches tall. With this given height, the waist should measure 27 inches; the bust, 34 inches; each thigh, 25 inches.

Nine Types of Figures—Which Is Yours?

A few of us seem to be absolutely correct—or so closely approximate ideal proportions that we may term ourselves average—at least just so long as we honestly consult the truth-telling mirror and protect this precious gift of Eve with the right corset.

The second group is made up of those whose vertical measurements are uniformly just a little longer in proportion than their horizontal—a trifle more than 5 feet, 5 inches tall though not more, and usually less, than 25 inches around the thigh. This is the Tall Slender Group.

Another group are more than 5 feet, 5 inches tall, but a bit more solidly built—the Tall Heavy. The Short Slender Group are both shorter and more slender than the average. The fifth group, the Short Heavy, are shorter than the average though not so slender. The sixth may be of any height, but, alas, they're not quite in proportion because, from the waist up, their measurements are all in excess of what they should be, and this constitutes their main problem to beauty. This is the Large Above the Waist Group. The seventh reverses the region of discomfort; they measure a good bit more than 25 inches around each thigh and constitute the Large Below the Waist Group. The eighth—one of the biggest groups—contains all short waisted ladies. The ninth is formed of those whose defect isn't one of "inches" but whose backs are curved. And the fashionable woman must avoid a curved back line as she avoids an unbecoming color.

Type Corsetry—For You

Not to know the type to which one belongs and the type ideal toward which one should strive—not to know the secret that will be health-giving as well as style-giving—is to miss the whole magic of personality. You simply can't keep youthfulness and beauty and piquancy inside the wrong corset—any more than you can keep them for long without any corset. Gossard Type Corsetry is the very foundation of that lovely picture that every real woman wants to make of herself—and can—if she knows the secret.

Perhaps you have just been buying your corsets by waist measure and leaving the rest to chance. That's fatal! Gossard artistry hasn't thought of you in such a vague way. You have been thought of as belonging to one of the nine figure groups—wherever your measurements locate you.

The Gossard Corsets designed to fit your very own figure will help you to stand and walk as you should; they will mould and coax a too generous curve; they can even rescue lines that are not curved sufficiently. And they will do all this with a comfort such as you never knew before, and will outwear two or even three ordinary corsets. Do you realize for how little you can buy these comfortable, graceful, sensible, healthful Gossard Corsets? They are very moderately priced within the reach of every woman.

*Ideal Figure

Gossard Brassieres, like Gossard Corsets, are unerringly designed for types and are moderately priced within the reach of every woman. See the new "Longerlyne" models; they are specially shaped and have added length to comfortably complete the present type of low-top corsets.

Miss Hill has just completed a tiny gem of a book, "YOU." It talks of personalities and becoming clothes in a way that any woman who would make the most of her natural beauty will treasure. A copy is yours for the asking, if you will write your request to

Large Hats, an it Please Your Ladyship

By CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

MEASURING the size of our hats by the length of our skirts, is a new idea, and to be a la mode, that is what we must do this Autumn. Instead of sitting in front of a mirror which reflects just our head and shoulders, to do the thing right, we should stand in front of a full length one, where we can survey ourselves from head to foot, while we select our new chapeau, for fashion authorities tell us that the length of the skirt makes all the difference in the world in the size and shape of hat we wear.

Of course you know that skirts are to be lengthened. No longer can the male critic "make his moan" over the shortness of our skirts, which he really likes but just those which turn off the face a little more abruptly, and of course there are tri-cornes and bicornes—when was there ever a season without them? And, who knows, but they may be the most popular type of all, for we must admit that a very large hat worn above a huge fur collar is rather grotesque; however, perhaps Fashion may further decree that we must wear our coat collars open in front and flat behind. If so, this will make the large hat possible without making us look as if we had no necks at all. There is no millinery material so becoming as velvet, and so one always welcomes a season when it is to be used for millinery. Word comes direct from Paris that this is to be the milliner's choice of materials, and that there are to be all kinds of beautiful Persian colorings as well as black and brown, and with them will be metallic laces and brocades, and beautiful ribbons in metlasse effect, and no end of hand work.

SOME of the pattern hats that have just arrived have the trimming piled high in front like a pyramid, long loops of ribbon or silk for instance; and then again, it pleases the milliner's fancy to drape them across the side, and the importance of long ribbon loops—wide ribbon—must not be underestimated. Also there is Persian embroidery and shirring. One large flat brimmed model seen in a show room, had velvet and faille silk combined, one half of the covering being velvet and the other silk, and both were shirred from the centre of the top of the crown to the edge of the brim in spiral effect. The to be contrary says he doesn't. The mandate has gone forth: seven to nine inches from the floor for dresses, with separate skirts and suit skirts just a little shorter, and, no potentate ever issued a mandate that will be more generally obeyed. Fashion is like a beloved princess, whose wishes have only to be known to be gratified, and there's no way of explaining the why or the wherefore of this blind obedience. But the fact remains. And because brevity is to give way to length, we must change the style of our headwear—we must wear larger hats. But in the interval, a word or two about the chic felt hats which are being worn now and will be for September.

We used to think we were "rushing" the season outrageously and almost expected someone to call us blasé if we bought a felt hat for the local fall fair; but now they are worn all through the heat of the summer, and there's no use trying to think we don't like them. We do. And they don't look a bit out of place, with a pretty flower-colored tub frock. Grey is one of the pretty shades we shall be wearing for early autumn, and the hats are rather mannish shaped instead of the round, up-rolling brim which the flapper has made her own this summer. They will go splendidly with a tweed sports suit.

When skirts were short, hats were necessarily rather simple—not too much trimming, and what there was lay flat on the brim or drooped over the side of it, as a rule. But types like the Gainsborough go with the longer skirt, although we have not quite returned to the Gainsborough period. We are probably headed for it, and when one thinks of its picturesqueness, there is little reason for regret. The fashionable hat of the autumn has a wide brim that droops close around the face, and then changes its mind and rolls upward. The backs are short, and the contour is broad rather than round. Looking at it straight in front, it looks very broad. Other types are White felt with soft crown, with rolled brim edged with black. Satin rosette with jet and rhinestone ornament in centre.
